Leveraged Buyouts: The Challenges of Maturity
With each passing year, the leverage buyout segment of mergers and acquisitions becomes a more established market with its own set of conventions for executing transactions. In the case of LBOs, however, entrenchment breeds innovation so the major players can continue to weather the tough competition for good deals. In this special section, M&A looks at such cutting-edge issues as stock options for managements, new bank lending techniques, and recycling of the old LBO to a new financial buyer.

CONFERENCE

Excerpts from the Sixth Annual Conference on Advanced Issues in Mergers and Acquisitions
The m&a market is never at a loss for new issues to cope with. While still crafting their deals to gain an edge in the fierce marketwide competition, strategic buyers are grappling with a potentially costly and painful set of problems that fall under the heading of risk management — environmental issues, product liability, pensions and other benefits, to name some. These were among the issues worked over at the annual gathering of 150 m&a professionals.

Strategy

Business Diversification: Has It Taken A Bad Rap?

Stephen L. Nesbitt and Randall R. King

Prevailing wisdom of investors and strategists gives short shrift to the diversified company. However, two analysts at Wilshire Associates assert that there is no difference in operating performance or total return to shareholders between diversified and "pure play" concerns. Their conclusion: Basic strategy is less important than how it is carried out.

WHEN JUDGED STRICTLY on its merits as a strategy, widespread business diversification neither helps nor hinders corporate performance or the delivery of returns to shareholders. Collectively speaking, highly diversified and "pure-play" companies have shown strikingly similar performance patterns. This suggests that implementation of the strategy, rather than the strategy itself, is the primary ingredient for corporate success or failure.

We based these conclusions on the results of a comprehensive, computer-based analysis of the performance and returns to shareholders of approximately 1,800 companies from 1978 to 1988. The sample included a mix of firms that were undiversified, diversified in areas closely related to the core business, and presented a high degree of unrelated diversification through operations that did not offer significant synergies with the largest enterprise. Separate analyses were conducted for industrials and utilities.

Our study showed no statistically conclusive evidence that unrelated diversification either benefits or hurts corporate performance. This was the case for both industrial and utility companies that engage in diversification.

It was equally clear from the data that diversification has almost no impact on corporate success. Diversified and undiversified companies appear to have an equal chance of performing well or poorly. Diversification, as part of a corporate strategy, can be equally well-executed to benefit shareholders or poorly executed to shareholder detriment.

Stephen L. Nesbitt is a Vice President of Wilshire Associates, a Santa Monica, Calif., institutional investment consulting firm, and Randall R. King is a Senior Associate.

Market and operating performance

While our study is not the first to examine the impact of diversification, it invades new analytical territories in attempting to gauge corporate performance and shareholder returns. The other analyses were based principally on stock market event studies or small samples of recognized diversified companies. They are almost evenly divided between those concluding that diversified companies perform better than nondiversified companies, those claiming there is no difference in performance, and those concluding that diversification hurts performance.

Unlike the other surveys, we have included both industrials and utilities, and identified levels of diversification through business segment data that have been reported publicly since a 1977 mandate by the Financial Accounting Standards Board (FASB No. 14). In addition, we broadened the performance yardsticks. They include two measurements of market performance — total common stock returns and risk-adjusted common stock return

(measured by alpha) — and three measures of operating performance — return on equity, return on assets, and earnings-per-share growth. (See sidebar on methodology on page 29 for a description of the survey methods.)

In determining performance, we used computer-based scatter diagrams to calculate each measure. Each scatter point represented one company in one year. Thus, if we were evaluating 10 companies across 10 years, there would be 100 data points. In the case of our industrial universe, there were more than 13,000 data points, while the utilities universe had nearly 2,100 data points for the 11-year analytical time frame. After all the points had been recorded, we drew a dashed horizontal line across the chart to represent the statistical average for all of the data points.

Figure 1 is representative of the resulting charts. It covers Total Return — combined capital appreciation and dividend return on common stock — for industrial companies. The average yearly return for all industrials in the survey was 13.24 percent.

Note the construction of the chart. The performance measure is at the left-hand vertical axis while the horizontal axis at the bottom portrays the diversification ratios of the companies in the industrial sample starting with 0.00 for undiversified at left. The greater the degree of unrelated diversification, the higher the ratio for a particular company.

Regardless of the diversification ratios, the scatter points were well-distributed across the chart and on either side on the average Total Return line. If diversification did negatively impact corporate performance, we would expect the scatter points at the right side of the chart — where the highly diversified companies were situated — to plot lower than the scatter points on the left side, which was home to the undiversified firms. This did not appear to be the case.

Thus, for Total Return, we could conclude that there was no statistically significant relationship between unrelated diversification and corporate performance.

Figure 1 also contains a solid line which is the least squares regression line of best fit. It represents the best statistical estimate of the relationship between performance and diversification. If this regression line also were horizontal, like the dashed average value line, it would indicate that the statistical findings are identical to what visually appeared on the scatter diagrams to be no relationship between diversification and total return.

However, the regression line is not perfectly horizontal and slopes slightly upward. This would suggest that total return performance actually increases with diversification. However, the degree of difference is so small that it is not statistically significant enough to affirm that conclusion.

When adjusted for risk and measured by alpha, the average yearly return was minus 0.1 percent, suggesting that the industrial universe as a whole did not produce returns in excess of expectations. But again, the scatter points were well-distributed across the chart indicating that both diversified and undiversified firms contributed rather equally to the negative showing. The regression line again sloped slightly upward to a statistically insignificant degree.

As for operating performance measures, the scatter diagrams were basically replicated but the regression lines sloped slightly downward. The average return on equity was 13.27 percent, the average return on assets was 12.29 percent, and the average growth in earnings per share was 10.75 percent. The downward slope of the regression lines might suggest that operating performance measures decrease with diversification.

The seemingly conflicting results between market and operating performances are not necessarily so. Diversification often lowers a company's cost of capital, allowing shareholder value to be created (i.e., positive risk-adjusted returns) even though lower operating return projects are engaged.

What is most important is that all the regression lines were not statistically significant despite the very large data set. Statistical analysis cannot conclude with any reasonable level of probability that unrelated diversification impacts corporate performance, either market-based or operating.

Table 1 (see page 25) provides some statistical data on how the regression lines for industrial companies were produced.

Column two shows the average values from the regression line for an undiversified company (diversification measure equals zero) and column three shows the average value from the regression line for a company with half its assets in unrelated businesses (diversification measure equals 50 percent). Column four gives the t-statistic of the slope. Values above 1.95 would indicate that the slope is statistically significant at a 95-percent confidence level, or that the slope could not be zero. All values shown are below 1.95. Therefore, the true slope easily could be zero and the differences in the values shown in columns three and four are not statistically meaningful.

Table 2: Industrials vs. Utilities Undiversified Performance Results 1978 to 1988

Performance Measure	Undiversified Industrials	Undiversified Utilities
Total Return	12.32%	17.63%
Alpha (monthly)	-0.17%	0.46%
Return on Equity	13.47%	14.42%
Return on Assets	12.55%	10.67%
EPS Growth	12.13%	4.73%

Application of the same analytical techniques to the utility sector produced patterns that were similar to those of industrials. Inspection of the scatter diagrams again indicated a fairly even distribution of points among the various diversification ratios. The average results were: 16.87 percent for total return, 0.41 percent for risk-adjusted return, 14.06 percent for return on equity, 10.51 percent for return on assets, and 4.73 percent for growth in earnings-per-share. However, the regression lines sloped slightly downward to a statistically insignificant degree on all measures except per-share earnings growth where the regression line tracked the average.

But, before going further, it is important to digress to note the significant differences in the market and operating performance of industrials vs. utilities over the 11-year study period if the utility findings are to be accurately interpreted. Performance results for undiversified industrials and utilities for 1978 through 1988 are shown in Table 2. Clearly, undiversified utilities have outperformed undiversified industrials in most categories.

Except for return on assets and earnings-per-share growth, undiversified utilities did significantly better than industrials. The differences are especially large for the total return and alpha measures. Consequently, given the measurement period our study covers, we would expect unrelated diversification by utilities to produce lower performance measures not because unrelated diversification, per se, hurts performance but because over this measurement period, undiversified utilities performed surprisingly well relative to industrial businesses into which they diversify. We would expect industrials to generally do better than utilities because of greater business risk. However, the deflationary business environment, declining interest rates, and strong utility cash flow proved to be very positive for utility performance over the past 11 years. Table 3 (see page 26) provides statistical data on the regression lines for utilities' performance measures.

Only in the case of total return is there a statistically significant relationship. The t-statistic of the slope, 3.80 in column four, exceeds the 1.95 level. Unrelated utility diversification lowers total return. A 50-percent diversified utility produced a 13.60 percent annual return while an undiversifed utility returned 17.63 percent. However, undiversified industrials returned only 12.32 percent for this period. Diversification by utilities into industrial business will naturally reduce total return so a statistically significant negative relationship is not surprising, nor does it necessarily imply that future utility diversification will lower total return. This is a problem presented by the time period examined.

The fact that none of the other relationships are statistically significant is very important. This is especially true for risk-adjusted return which measures shareholder added value.

Therefore, proper interpretation of the statistical data points to no conclusive evidence that unrelated diversification hurts or helps utility shareholder performance. The statistically significant negative total return impact from utility diversification is a byproduct of superior utility total return vs. industrials for the period studied and not diversification. Events could easily be reversed over the next 11 years causing a significant positive result to utility diversification.

The final step in the analysis was a portfolio exercise which stepped down from the average measures to rate how specific segments of companies performed. Based on their degrees of diversification, seven industrial and seven utility subgroups were created. The performance measure was excess return, or alpha, calculated on an average monthly basis. Figure 2 shows the alphas for the industrial subgroups and Figure 3 (see page 30) the alphas for the utility subgroups.

Diversified utilities set the pace

Industrial diversification subgroups show mixed results. The undiversified industrials produced negative alphas, with a risk-adjusted return of minus .136 percent. The best performers, and the only ones to show positive risk-adjusted returns, were in the modestly diversified subgroup — diversification ratios of one to 10 percent — with risk-adjusted returns of 0.59 percent. The firms with the highest degrees of unrelated diversification produced mildly negative alphas but still performed better than the "pure plays."

Interestingly, the most diversified companies comprised the best performing utilities subgroup with a 0.54 percent average risk adjusted return per month. Utilities with no diversification or modest diversification also generated positive returns although those with unrelated diversification ratios in the 31 percent to 50 percent brackets were negative. Even though there is a slight negative relationship overall between unrelated diversification and alpha, the very diversified utility companies have produced value-added shareholder returns.The patterns shown in the alpha measurements are consistent with our basic conclusion that unrelated diversification has no systematic impact on performance of industrial or utility companies. ■ assimilation of experienced professionals. Even for big money-center banks this is not an easy task. While most have equity or mezzanine booking subsidiaries under their holding companies, few have understood the activities performed by these officers or have effectively tapped their skills in an integrated fashion.

Internally unified decisionmaking involves, in practice, the setting of broad LBO parameters: by deal size, types of industries, exiting methods, relative roles to be played, and some notion as to the outer limits of any deal structure. This enables all internal groups, including the credit authorities, to react quickly when an actual deal is at hand. In addition, equity/mezzanine skills are needed to complement the existing credit-analysis skills in the debt area in order to take a "whole deal" approach.

The outcome of these integrated skills should be the creation of specialized "crack teams" of marketing, credit, and legal officers who can take any deal across the LBO business system: origination, structuring, funding, and post-deal monitoring. As deal flow increases, the banks' senior management constantly should be reviewing the parameters of deal structures to maintain a portfolio balanced by industries, geographic diversity, types of funds extended, participation sizes, and maturity schedules.

Third, banks must work hard to change their traditional image as passive debt suppliers. In so doing, they may come across considerable resistance from deal arrangers and equity investors who would prefer that banks stay with their historic roles.

In practice, this third group of changes is external in nature. It involves the systematic leveraging of the first two groups of improvements in negotiations with deal arrangers, in order to obtain wider and deeper roles over the life cycle of the deal. This will entail sharp external marketing and public relations work to various potential deal sources including the target company management.

The liquidation approach may be negated simply because the prime LBO candidate is a mature, cash flow-rich business with solid management. If that kind of company can't repay its debts, lenders will have a hard time selling assets even at bargain prices.

The transition from traditional debt tranche financing to some variation of blended debt-equity or strip financing is both necessary and feasible for most major commercial banks wishing to play a significant role in LBOs in the U.S. and the U.K. The external factors that have prevented commercial banks in the past from consciously undertaking strip financing under a unified decisionmaking approach can be dealt with through sophisticated deal-structuring techniques. Indeed, the bigger obstacle for most commercial banks will not be the external factors (as innovative banks already are undertaking forms of strip financing), but the internal psychological block against equity-oriented products and a lack of equity-oriented skills. ■ forma revenues in 1989 will be close to $45 million, and operating profits in excess of $4.5 million – nearly five times the size of the original Harrington. The company has grown from 330 employees in 1986 to nearly 1,000, making Harrington one of the largest third-party administrators in the U.S.

At this point, three years after the leveraged acquisition of Harrington, everyone is happy.

Chemical Bank and Huntington National Bank know they have invested in a solid business with demonstrated ability to service the interest payments on the debt and rapidly retire the principal. Harrington already has paid down $3 million of the $24 million in bank debt incurred in the acquisitions, and the majority of what remains is at fixed rates between 10.5 percent and 11.5 percent.

Chemical Bank, in fact, was issued warrants for 3 percent of Harrington's common stock for bending some of their traditional lending requirements because Harrington lacked a large base of physical assets.

Management, even after the dilution of the TPA acquisition, has a 25.5-percent share and the autonomy to manage the business day to day. Alan Patricof Associates has restricted its role to guidance in long-term strategy, largely on acquisitions and financing. Management will share in the decision to either sell the company or go public. ■

Options for Creating Value

Internal and External Techniques in Restructuring

Sustainability of Returns: The Unsung Hero in Creating Value

Sustaining generous cash flows and high returns over long periods is the key to creating shareholder value from ongoing assets, according to John L. Forbis of Arthur D. Little Inc. Ironically, he asserts, most publicly owned companies don't address the issue of sustainability even though it is a crucial matter for corporate raiders, privately owned companies, and firms acquired in leveraged buyouts. "Sustainability is the unsung hero in creating value," Forbis maintained.

An extended period of high returns on investment, Forbis stated, can have a two-pronged impact on value. First, the high returns themselves generate cash. And the production of lofty returns reduces the need for extensive reinvestment in the assets. "So cash is available for restructuring the balance sheet," Forbis noted.

The Market for Debt Created In Leveraged Recapitalizations

Leveraged recapitalizations, much like leveraged buyouts, are driven by earnings before taxes and cash flow, notes Christopher J. Perry of Continental Bank. In a typical recap, the senior debt will represent around 62 percent to 63 percent of the capital structure and the mezzanine debt will be about 25 percent. In terms of multiples, the total debt will run around 6.5 to eight times earnings before interest and taxes (EBIT) — with senior debt running around four to five times operating income and mezzanine debt being around two to 2.25 times EBIT.

Commercial banks, the principal senior lenders, usually charge interest of the prime rate plus 1.5 to 2.5 points and levy closing fees of about 2 percent of the total loan, which typically is amortized over eight years. Subordinated debt, Perry stated, generally carries coupons yielding 350 to 600 basis points over comparable Treasury securities and runs for terms of eight to 10 years, with underwriting and placement fees of 3.5 percent to 4 percent. The mezzanine debt usually is sold in private transactions with coupons being slightly higher than subordinated debt and the underwriting and placement fees coming to about 4 percent.

While the senior debt is heavily collateralized and highly liquid in that it can be laid off by the lead banks with other institutions, the junior debt holders get higher returns for less security and liquidity. Perry said that the banks usually get "substantial covenant protection" and sometimes gain a pledge of stock in the borrowers' subsidiaries "so they have a second way out." By contrast, the subordinated debt, although quite liquid, is usually unsecured and has limited covenant protection.

Nonetheless, the mezzanine debt — with little liquidity, no security, and slight covenant protection — can generate "returns as high as 30 percent," Perry stated.

Weathering the Tighter Rules For Tax-Free Spin-Offs

Glenn Corlett of Price Waterhouse reminds restructuring companies that the Internal Revenue Service tightened the rules somewhat for executing tax-free spin-offs of divisions or subsidiaries. The new regulations promulgated in early 1989 "more narrowly defined" the scope of a "valid business purpose." That is one of several elements a parent must demonstrate to gain tax-free treatment for both the corporation and the stockholders who will receive the shares of the spun-off unit.

"The IRS made it clear that a valid business purpose had to be a valid business purpose for the corporation, not a purpose of the shareholder," Corlett said.

How Affiliated Publications Distributed Its Cellular Telephone Riches to Shareholders

Affiliated Publications Inc. was suffering from too much of a good thing. The prosperous publisher of the Boston Globe was enjoying a spectacular paper gain on a fling into the burgeoning cellular telephone field but was not able to pass this value on to shareholders. Compounding the dilemma was that liquifying the investment through a straightforward sale would have drawn a massive tax bill. The response: a unique spin-off.

As detailed by Brian Finn of First Boston Corp., Affiliated's $75 million investment in MacCaw Cellular Communications in 1981 had swollen to $2.2 billion by early 1989 — reflecting the great prospects envisioned by investors for cellular telephones. Yet, MacCaw, like most cellular firms pouring huge amounts into expansion, was still losing money. As 47-percent owner of MacCaw, Affiliated had to take a proportionate share of the losses in its own results and was itself running in the red. "The stock traded like a cellular stock, not a newspaper stock," Finn noted. "It was a highly volatile stock that moved with MacCaw and not with the great franchise that the Globe enjoyed." But, a sale of the MacCaw block would have cost Affiliated $700 million to $800 million in taxes.

The technique was to spin-off the Globe and other publishing interests. The old Affiliated, holding the MacCaw interests, then was merged into MacCaw in an exchange of stock. Both were tax-free transactions. Thus, Affiliated holders owned stock in two separate companies and "three-quarters of a billion dollars in taxes was saved," Finn pointed out. ■

41 Did the Time Decision Torpedo the Hostile Bid?
Jonathan J. Lerner
Corporate raiders took no comfort from the Delaware decision in the Time-Warner-Paramount case. Directors gained the right to use long-term strategies as grounds for rejecting unsolicited bids. There was, however, no blanket authority to "just say no."

46 A User-Friendly Technique For Evaluating Targets
Patrick J. Lyons and Anthony Fabiano
Computer-literate acquisition analysts may be overlooking a critical resource by ignoring expert system technology, also known as the knowledge base. There is an easy way of marrying the bases with electronic work sheets to judge a group of candidates. The results are a quick feedback on how well the targets match the buyer's wish list.

51 Unleashing Property Values to Finance M&A Transactions
Scott E. Fredrick
Real estate has evolved from a "hidden asset" into a financing centerpiece in acquisitions. Innovative instruments, such as mortgage-backed securities, convertible mortgages, and partnerships, can raise funds to pay for the deal. There is even a use for real estate in takeover defenses.

58 How Employee Thievery Can Plague an Acquisition
Raymond G. Boyd Sr.
Workers at both merger partners may be less enchanted about the deal than their employers. Employees sometimes have vented their anger by stealing. The challenge is to stop the losses before they erase the benefits of the acquisition.

65 Creative Detective Work in Acquiring Overseas Firms
Camille H. Chwalek
American firms may be blowing overseas acquisition opportunities by accepting a sparsity of credible information at face value. While hard to come by, data on foreign targets may be more available than a surface examination suggests. The trick is to weave shreds of information into a coherent package.

Payday for M&A Advisers

For the first time, there is hard evidence that the mergers and acquisitions advisory services represent — at a bare minimum — a billion dollar-a-year business.

Known fees collected by intermediaries in completed m&a transactions during the first nine months of 1989 came to $1.27 billion, according to calculations by the M&A Data Base. That surpasses the amount recorded in any previous year — let alone part of a year — and suggests that another peak for dealmaking fees will be set for all of 1989.

But even that figure doesn't come close to suggesting the full magnitude of fee-generating revenues for advisers and intermediaries practicing in the m&a marketplace. It is based on data that are available for a mere 63 deals, or only 0.25 percent of the 2,493 mergers, acquisitions, and divestitures completed between January 1 and September 30, 1989.

However, the data do reflect the fees produced in many of the megadeals and other large transactions. That is underscored by the fact that the dollar value of the 63 deals with reported fees account for a far higher percentage of the known dollar value for all m&a transactions than their proportion of total dealmaking. The dollar value for the 63 deals was about $60 billion, or 36.7 percent of the $163.3 billion that changed hands in all deals during the first nine months of 1989.

Although advisory fees are revealed in only a handful of transactions, these shreds of information confirm that m&a services comprise a multibillion dollar business.

Impressive as the fragmentary fee data may be, they point up the difficulties in gauging the complete magnitude of the mergers, acquisitions, and divestitures market in general. For example, an exact dollar value for all businesses sold at a minimum price tag of $1 million each can only be guessed at. Historically, prices are announced for only about one-half of the deals that can be comfortably consigned to that category. Among the major blank spots are sales of closely owned companies strictly within the private market in which there is no legal compulsion to disclose price or any other financial information. Prices often are kept secret as well in the acquisition of middle-sized private companies by public corporations and in divestitures by publicly owned firms. In those cases, the public companies usually claim that neither the acquired nor the divested properties have material effects on their financial and operating results.

Nevertheless, the pricing information is an oasis compared with fee data. Even in deals between two public companies, there are no strict requirements for disclosing fees, unless they are somehow material — a squiggly and vaguely defined standard at best. As a result, disclosures are often judgment calls. As the sparsity of information suggests, the vast majority of buyers, sellers, and intermediaries would prefer to keep the figures confidential.

For the purposes of this report, the assembled fee information pertained only to the money paid out to financial advisers, such as investment banks and other m&a intermediaries that helped buyers and sellers put the deals together. Excluded were fees paid for financing, fairness opinions, legal services, tender offer and depository work, various types of due diligence, securities underwriting, and other professional services within the m&a process.

Of the nearly $1.3 billion in known fees for the first nine months of 1989, about four-fifths was acknowledged by acquirers. Fees on the buy-side came to about $1.04 billion. Known fees by targets amounted to $223 billion.

The preponderance of information on the buy-side during the first nine months of 1989 has several implications that may or may not be applicable to fee trends in general. One con-

These data, supplied by the M&A Data Base, spotlight the positions of middle-market transactions and companies in the mergers and acquisitions marketplace. Middle-market transactions are defined as deals valued between $1 million and $50 million, or having a target with sales between $1 million and $75 million. Middle-market acquirers are defined as those with sales between $1 million and $75 million.

principal determined that in the future he would think twice about to whom he spoke and what he said in the course of checking into an acquisition candidate.

As noted earlier, shareholder information is quite difficult to get in most foreign countries. It is even harder to determine who actually owns many European companies because the structures often are far more complex than those of U.S. firms. We confronted this problem when we tried some years ago to put together an organizational tree on the holdings of Sir James Goldsmith.

Putting the pieces together

We began by going through Dun & Bradstreet credit reports, although fully realizing that since those reports are voluntary they have to be viewed with some suspicion. When we searched under his name or the names of his known directors or executives, he just didn't show up. His presence was camouflaged. But in checking out two or three companies that we definitely knew he was involved with, one other person's name kept popping up. Suspecting that he was Sir James' right-hand man, we started searching under his name. A batch of companies emerged along with another bonus — the repetitious listing of the name of a legal adviser. A search under her name revealed still other companies — a 90-percent interest here, a 10-percent interest there, an 80-percent holding somewhere else. Before, we were finished we were able to piece these fragments of information together to form the organizational tree we wanted.

Even beyond the search-and-screen stage, such creativity in the use of data bases can yield enormous dividends in evaluating acquisition targets. There is, for example, an excellent opportunity to gain an edge even when the information on a target is being marketed widely through a black book or offering documents. The assumptions in these materials often seem optimistic. In a few hours, the analyst who knows his or her way around the data bases ought to be able to determine how realistic, or unrealistic, these assumptions really are.

I once was consulted by the potential buyer of a small company that made manhole covers. He was sure that the company was the only one in the field because of the small size of the market. A quick check of our data base found a competitor, based only six miles from the target, that was three times as large and much more profitable. The search took between five and 10 minutes.

I would strongly encourage any active acquirer to develop some in-house data base expertise. Ideally, the staff should include a trained MBA who can manipulate the data bases with the same ease that he or she manipulates a Lotus spreadsheet.

The largest single users of data bases are the Japanese. They are paying many millions of dollars a year for the information. The users have to be dumping entire data bases for that kind of money. But many European and American companies, as well as investment houses in Japan, are becoming increasingly sophisticated in utilizing data bases.

Just a word of caution: The tools are there. They are not the be-all and end-all of analysis. They simply are tools to aid in judgment. The cost of finding specific information can run from a few hundred dollars to a few thousand dollars a clip. But the price may be very economical when compared with the stakes involved in an acquisition decision. ■

Key Dimensions of M&A Activity

74 Leading Financial Advisers in Most Active M&A Industries
Most major investment banks and mergers and acquisitions intermediaries have proved to be adept at handling deals in a variety of industries, which suggests that except for a few areas — such as media — highly focused specialists have yet to emerge. At least for now, dealmaking, rather than industry expertise, is the primary contributor to market share in the advisory business.

77 Control Premiums in Mergers and Acquisitions
As the m&a market widened and its primary players became more sophisticated, control premiums over stock prices contracted on average during the 1980s. In 1980, the average premium two months before a deal was announced was nearly 78 percent. But in the highly competitive years of 1988 and 1989, the premiums fell into the 40-percent range. The trends point up that premium magnitudes have tended to run inversely with stock market ups and downs. The long-range trends also confirm that year after year, premiums narrow steadily as the deal announcement date approaches.

79 Long-Range Stock Price Trends in Major Acquirers in Selected Large Acquisitions in 1988
Are major acquirers permanently penalized for their deals? For acquirers in 20 major 1988 deals, 12 stock prices fell and eight rose in reaction to deal announcements, but most changes were fractional. By September 1989, prices for 17 of the 20 buyers were well ahead of the levels at the times the deals were announced, generally in line with the overall movement of the stock market.

80 Reverse LBOs
About 18 companies that were acquired in leveraged and management buyouts went public in 1988 and the first 10 months of 1989. Only six of them were selling above their initial offering prices by the end of October 1989.

Innovations to Minimize Acquisition Goodwill

Robert H. Herz and Edward J. Abahoonie

Tax strategy is a more forceful driver of deal structures, as purchase prices outrun actual values. Eliminating or minimizing nondepreciable goodwill is a key way to harvest tax, and has led to the increasingly popular deal format in which the buyer gets less than full control of the target. The Dow-Marion combination is a classic example.

42 Knowing the Ropes in Buying Government Contractors

Thomas J. Madden and James F. Worrall

Acquiring a firm with federal contracts is no cut-and-dried proposition. The government carefully scrutinizes contract transfers and the buyer that doesn't follow the rules can lose the work or suffer disbarment on future contracts. In some cases, the rules can be turned against a hostile bidder as an antitakeover device.

47 Did the Treasury Win or Lose in the RJR Buyout?

Gerard A. Cahill and Camille P. Castorina

Two finance professors, who sized up the massive RJR Nabisco LBO from several angles, claim it will generate a net gain in tax revenue by the end of the 1990s. They agree that deduction of the interest on acquisition debt is costly to the Treasury. But taxes from selling shareholders, reinvestments, divestiture proceeds, and other sources should more than offset the drain.

25 ■ ROUNDTABLE

How Debt Is Financing More Takeovers in Europe

Eight prominent dealmakers operating in Europe track the growth in m&a debt financing overseas.

■ MIDDLE MARKET

57 Middle-Market Report: Entrepreneurs that elected Subchapter S status before 1987 can avoid double taxation in selling their companies.

58 Negotiating a Fair Division of Environmental Costs

George Pilko

Intensified federal and state environmental regulations have complicated m&a dealmaking. A great element of uncertainty about future risks and costs threatens to scuttle many transactions. But negotiating tactics and contract provisions have been established to satisfy buyers, sellers, lenders, and other key parties so a deal can be completed with some peace of mind.

■ INTERNATIONAL M&A

64 Worldscene: Siemens agreed to take control of Nixdorf Computer, rescuing the onetime high flyer and expanding its own market share.

65 How the Common Market Will Control Large Mergers

John Osborne

At last, the European Economic Community has a policy for regulating mergers. After 16 years of wrangling, the EC decided to focus on large deals that impact competition across the Common Market. The policy could affect U.S. dealmaking as well.

Knowing the Ropes in Buying U.S. Contractors

Thomas J. Madden and James F. Worrall

Persuading a firm holding government contracts to agree to a deal may be only step one in the acquisition. The buyer has to convince the government to approve a transfer of the contracts to the new owner, and that may take more hard selling.

ACQUISITION OF A TARGET company whose assets include contracts with the U.S. government can create unique problems for the buyer. A complex series of federal laws and regulations covering government contracts set down strict rules on the purchaser's ability to inherit the contracts. Failure to comply with them may jeopardize the transaction itself or lead to the loss of the contracts, which may have been primary drivers in the transaction.

In this article, we discuss pertinent statutes, regulations, and issues applying to acquisitions of companies with government contracts. We cover the Anti-Assignment of Contracts Act and its implementing regulations, the security clearance restrictions governing the release of classified information, and the appropriate content of the representations and warranties clause in an asset purchase agreement. We have omitted discussion of the Exon-Florio amendment to the Defense Production Act that provides for review of foreign acquisitions of U.S. companies in the national security area which was explored in a previous issue (See Mergers & Acquisitions, November/December 1989).

The Anti-Assignment of Contracts Act expressly prohibits the transfer of government contracts from one company to another without government acquiescence. That acquiescence takes the form of a legal instrument known as a novation agreement. Regulations detail the required content of novation agreements and carve out limited exceptions to government approval.

When cost-type contracts are involved in the merger, the government will seek assurances that no increase in expenses because of the merger are reflected in any government contracts. When the contracts involved are fixed-price-type contracts, the government will seek assurances that the new company will have the same capability to perform as did the company that was originally awarded the contract. According to the applicable regulations, the decision to approve or disapprove the transfer is made by a "reasonable contracting officer." When a company performs contracts for more than one government agency, contracts will be assigned to an administrative contracting officer, according to Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) 42.1202. The regulations implementing the act are as significant for what they don't say as for what they expressly do state.

When an individual is debarred and must be removed from the company, the result may create a firm that is not an attractive acquisition candidate.

Appropriate language in representations and warranties that protect the buyer has become more critical in light of the executive branch's recent policy of "criminalizing" procurement cases. Before the shift, such cases were treated principally as matters of contract administration or as civil cases.

New regulations and laws, some of which were passed in response to the "Ill Wind" Pentagon fraud investigation, have imposed additional certification requirements — and, therefore, have expanded the criminal exposure of contractors — in an effort to detect and prevent procurement fraud. If these laws are not followed, civil fines and criminal penalties may be imposed. In addition, the acquiring company may be barred from future contracts with the government. Thus, a government contractor may be acquired only to have the purchaser debarred or suspended and thus prevented from obtaining future contracts with the government. This new law and enforcement policy add importance to the representations and warranties clause in the purchase agreement and require a careful review of the company's government contracts prior to the purchase.

The Anti-Assignment of Contracts Act, in pertinent part, provides that:

> No contract or order, or any interest therein shall be transferred by the party to whom such contract or order is given to any other party, and any such transfer shall cause the annulment of the contract or order transferred.

The act's all-encompassing language purports to forbid absolutely the transfer of government contracts or any interest in such contracts. The reference to an interest in a government contract could include, for example, an ownership interest in the company, of which the contracts would be an asset. The ownership interest most often is represented by the company's stock. Thus, under the act, even a transfer or sale of stock could nullify the government contracts.

Such an interpretation of the language would discourage a significant number of mergers or, at least, decrease the attractiveness, and, therefore, the price, of the takeover if much or all of the company's assets consisted of government contracts. However, a century of judicial interpretation of this provision has significantly limited the potentially all-encompassing prohibitions of the act. Moreover, a mechanism in the implementing regulations that permits the government to waive application of the law has mitigated its effect.

Rather than mechanically striking down any and all transfers, the courts have looked more carefully at whether the assignment was "within the mischief which Congress intended to prevent." The U.S. Claims Court, a chief arbiter of government contract disputes, has rejected any automatic application of the act in favor of a more "reasoned approach" to interpretation. Such an approach limits the act to those transfers that threaten the harms Congress intended to prevent when it passed the act. A major justification for the law was to make certain that the government did not lose the services of the contractor originally selected to perform the contract. Additionally, eliminating potential for fraud, undue influence, or multiple litigation are among the legislative objectives identified by the courts.

Leeway from the courts

This insistence on some relationship to the act's purpose has led courts to exempt large categories of transfers from the compass of the act. One of these categories, transfers by operation of law, not only permits a court-ordered transfer in connection with bankruptcy or probate, but also consistently treats various transactions, such as business combinations, as outside the purview of the act.

With respect to a transfer by merger, the U.S. Supreme Court, in the leading case of Seaboard Airline Railway v. the United States, refused in a 1921 ruling to apply the statute to a transfer resulting from the consolidation of two corporations. The Supreme Court in Seaboard was presented with the question of whether the acquisition of one railway company by another precluded the buyer's recovery from the U.S. for charges for transportation services originally payable to the target. The court interpreted the act as not intending to "discourage, hinder, or obstruct the orderly merger or consolidation of corporation." Seaboard thus established, relatively early, the principle that statutory mergers occurring under state laws are exempt from the law. Other cases have extended this exemption to "transfers by the succession of one business entity for another."

A company with substantial government contracts that is unwilling to be taken over could mount a defense based on the premise that the government might refuse to approve transfers in a hostile deal.

The key factor in applying the operation of law exemption is not the degree of voluntariness with which the parties enter into their transaction. That is because many of the transactions that the Supreme Court said resulted in transfers by operation of law are voluntary. Rather, the key factor to be considered in applying this exemption is the extent of changes in the control or management of the new business entity.

In a 1953 decision in the case of Thompson v. Commissioner of IRS, the Third Circuit Court of appeals said the courts "pragmatically test each situation by the extent to which the change deprives the government of the particular management and financial responsibility which rendered the contractor a responsible bidder." In practice, this means examining the specifics of the transaction to determine whether the original contractor using the same assets still controls contract performance. The courts have found the act inapplicable in instances where essentially the same entity (i.e., the work is performed using the same assets and management) executes the contract after the transfer.

Thus, courts have refused to apply the act when ownership of a claim or contract passed from a liquidated corporation to its stockholders, from a dissolved partnership to a newly formed corporation, or from an independent corporate contractor to its parent company when the contractor merged with and became a subsidiary of the parent. The determining factor in the relevant case law is control — not in the sense of legal title to a claim or contract, but with respect to actual control of the work performed under the contract.

The regulations implementing the act are found in the FAR, subpart 42, and individual agencies have supplemented these regulations. Like all regulations promulgated under the aegis of federal statutes, the regulations implementing the act derive their authority from the act and, accordingly, their reach is coextensive with the scope of the law. Therefore, unless the transfer is prohibited by the act, the FAR should not apply.

Since the act is for the government's benefit, courts have indicated that its provisions may be waived by the government. The FAR provides the mechanism whereby the government may waive the act's prohibition through a novation agreement. The FAR explains that a novation agreement is "a legal instrument executed by (a) the contractor (transferor or target company), (b) the successor in interest (transferee or purchaser), and (c) the government."

Under the agreement, the transferor guarantees performance of the contract, the transferee assumes all obligation under the contract, and the government recognizes the transfer of the contract and related assets. A suggested form for the novation agreement is set forth in the FAR.

An expansive approach by the government

Notwithstanding the principle that regulations are limited in scope by the act they implement, the government has adopted an expansive approach to the applicability of the FAR, applying the regulations even when the case law indicates that the act does not cover a particular transaction. Specifically, the government consistently has demanded novation of contracts in the context of mergers in which the decisional law indicates that the act does not apply.

In addition to questions about the legitimate scope of the FAR, there are other problems with applying the FAR provisions in merger and acquisition cases. By definition, a novation requires the transferor to guarantee performance and the transferee to assume all contract obligations. The government merely recognizes this transfer. However, in a merger or acquisition in which the transferor ceases to exist, which describes the majority of the mergers, no entity exists to provide this guarantee.

A more appropriate agreement may be drafted to incorporate requirements listed in FAR 42.1204 while omitting items not relevant in the context of a stock purchase or a statutory merger. This alternative agreement can be executed before the merger without the unnecessary attachments and without a guarantee, since performance should not be in doubt.

In summary, when a target company has prime government contracts, the government has required that a tripartite novation agreement be executed by the transferor, transferee, and itself. Without this agreement, the government contracts will be null and void. Such a result could have ramifications for the purchasing company's future dealings with the government, and subject the acquirer to fines and costs of reprocuring.

Conversely, the act may become an antitakeover shield. A company with substantial government contracts that is unwilling to be taken over could mount a defense based on the premise that the government might refuse to approve transfers in a hostile deal. Similarly, hostile bidders could be discouraged from trying to buy a government contractor.

The increasing complexity of government contract procedures and the criminalization of what previously were treated strictly as matters of contract administration, create another potential pitfall for the acquisition of a company with government work. Recently, heightened criminal and civil sanctions have been imposed on contractors found to have failed to follow acquisition regulations. This new policy increases the risk of acquiring a government contractor that might, after the acquisition, be found to have violated criminal statutes, such as the False Claims Act.

In such situations, the acquiring company may have a breach-of-warranty cause of action. As with any warranty claim, certain defenses exist. Since the acquiring company has access to the contracts and other financial papers during due diligence, the defendant could adopt an assumption of risk defense to the extent that contract problems were discoverable during the review.

Since the Anti-Assignments of Contracts Act is for the government's benefit, courts have indicated that its provisions may be waived by the government.

A typical "Representations and Warranties" section will contain paragraphs dealing with undisclosed liabilities and agreements and compliance with laws. For example, a typical clause will provide as follows:

Compliance with Laws except as disclosed in Schedule _____ (i) to the best knowledge of Seller, (it) is not in default under, or in violation of, any applicable statue, law, regulation, ordinance, decree, order, or rule of any governmental body or court.

That warranty, however, does not take into account a debarment or suspension of the contractor. A finding that the contractor has violated a law is not a necessary predicate to debarment or suspension of a contractor. Thus, the above clause should be expanded to include the potential for debarment and suspension. Along the same line, and to provide additional protection against debarment or suspension of the company, the acquirer should include a provision requiring notification of ongoing audits and investigations.

The warranty should:

- Protect against debarment and suspension;
- Protect against ongoing audits and investigations that might lead to claims against the company or to debarment; and
- Protect against cost disallowance as a result of an ongoing government audit.

The debarment not only may have an effect on the company, but also may affect key individuals in the company. Executives may be barred from participating in government contracts as a result of settling a debarment. If a target is being bought because of the expertise of its people, the debarment may deprive the acquirer of the expertise of those very individuals that made the acquisition attractive in the first place.

Loss of critical skills

When an individual is debarred and must be removed from the company or isolated from involvement in governmental contracts, the result may create a firm that is not an attractive acquisition candidate. Indeed, this happened to a small company that the authors have advised in the past. The company was formed by a person with unique expertise in the area of computers and data processing who later was debarred from governmental contracting. The firm has not been able to obtain the infusion of growth capital that an acquisition would provide. As a result, it has been rendered moribund.

Another significant hurdle that exists in the area of mergers and acquisitions among government contractors concerns security clearances. A Facility Security Clearance (FSC) "is an administrative determination that the facility is eligible...for access to classified information of the same or lower security category as the level of clearance being granted." Since many contracts for military-related items require access to classified information, the FSC is essential to performing these contracts. If ownership or management of a company changes, a new FSC must be obtained. An example of how security concerns may stifle an otherwise viable merger is the aborted proposal of Fujitsu Ltd. of Japan to acquire Fairchild Semiconductor Corp. from Schlumberger Ltd. Sen. James Exon (D-Neb.) in 1988 and two cabinet officers of Commerce, Secretary Malcom Baldridge and Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, all opposed this acquisition on national security grounds. In the face of this opposition, Fijitsu decided not to go forward with the deal.

Special factors apply when the target company with government contracts comes under other concerns taken under the control of foreign-based interests, and they can threaten the firm with loss of government work.

A company will be considered under foreign ownership, control, and influence (FOCI) and, therefore, ineligible for a security clearance, when "the degree of ownership, control, or influence from a foreign source is such that a reasonable basis exists for concluding that compromise of classified information might result." (ISR 2-201(b)). Factors considered in determining whether FOCI exists are enumerated in Section 2-202 of the ISR. Among the factors most pertinent in the context of a takeover is the first factor: "[f]oreign ownership or beneficial ownership of 5 percent or more of the organization's securities." (ISR 202(a).)

Isolating foreign owners

The regulations state, however, that if the factors indicate the existence of FOCI, the company may take certain steps that would enable it to obtain a security clearance. A resolution may be adopted by the board of directors excluding the foreign owners from access to classified material and from influencing the policies of the company. Alternatively, a voting trust agreement may be created to transfer title to shares of stock to trustees. A proxy agreement transferring voting rights to proxy holders may be created. Finally, reciprocal clearance and special security agreements may be used where applicable.

Strategically, acquisition of a company with substantial government contract work can be an important addition to both manufacturing and service organizations. Advantages can range from the securing of new technology to the acquisition of relatively stable new revenue streams. But the best-laid strategic plans can be totally thwarted if the acquirer doesn't abide by the all-important rules and regulations covering contract transfers and suffers a loss of government work. ■

Did the Treasury Win Or Lose in the RJR Buyout?

Gerard A. Cahill and Camille P. Castorina

The $24.7 billion RJR Nabisco deal triggered a near-backlash against LBOs when critics claimed it took mass advantage of the U.S. tax system. However, after a far-reaching analysis, two finance professors believe that by the end of the 1990s, the Treasury will come out well ahead as a result of the deal.

AS THE LARGEST ACQUISITION in history, the $24.7 billion leveraged buyout of RJR Nabisco Inc. not surprisingly rekindled the debate over the tax consequences of LBOs. Critics have claimed that the present U.S. tax system, in effect, subsidizes LBOs with a resulting substantial loss in revenues to the U.S. Treasury. However, a full analysis of the RJR transaction, incorporating myriad ripple effects, suggests that over the long haul deals of this type actually generate net gains for the government.

Gerard A. Cahill, Ph.D., is Associate Professor in the School of Management at Florida Institute of Technology in Melbourne, Fla., and a former senior executive at several companies. Camille P. Castorina, Ph.D., teaches political economy and international economics at the university and is an international consultant.

Critics principally focus their attacks on two features of the tax system that admittedly are pertinent to the execution of LBOs. One is the deductibility of interest on acquisition debt, which looms especially large in leveraged transactions that typically are financed 80 percent to 90 percent by borrowed funds, which subsequently become part of the target's capital structure. The second is the ability of the target to step up the value of its assets after the acquisition and realize substantial tax savings through a new schedule of depreciation.

However, the critics seldom account for a host of offsetting features that include taxes paid by shareholders on acquisition proceeds and returns from reinvestment of the money, revenues from financial institutions on their interest income, and taxes on cash received by the target from postacquisition divestitures. Our analysis indicates that these sources not only replace the initially lost funds but produce a net gain. In the case of RJR, the gain is estimated at nearly $5.5 billion over a 10-year period. For every $1 lost as a direct result of the acquisition, the Treasury would receive an estimated $1.12 from selling shareholders. The Treasury's take from the more indirect effects on the deal is $2.72 for every $1 lost.

The analysis, including projections based on established economic and financial principles and similarly grounded assumptions, is divided into four major segments:

- First-Order Effects — These are the direct taxes on shareholders. They represent the difference between taxes the Treasury would have received had the company not been acquired (revenues lost) and what the stockholders paid after selling their shares and realizing taxable gains (revenues gained).
- Second-Order Effects — Taxes paid by financial institutions on the interest they received for supplying the acquisition debt.
- Third-Order Effects — A Keynesian multiplier effect resulting from the shareholders' reinvestment of the acquisition proceeds.
- Fourth-Order Effects — Taxes paid by the target on postacquisition divestitures for cash.

Analysis of First-Order effects begins with an examination of the tax impact of the acquisition of common stock. RJR's approximately 226 million common shares were purchased at a blended price of $109 each, including $81 in cash, $18 in preferred stock, and $10 in senior converting debentures. The taxable portion was $91 — the cash and the debentures — and totaled nearly $20.6 billion in the aggregate. Receipt of the preferred was a tax-deferred exchange that reduced the shareholder's basis and served to increase the current tax liability.

The common traded in a range of $7.25 to $55.125 a share from 1971 to 1986, $31 to $55 in 1987, and $44 to $92.125 in 1988, the last full trading year before the deal was completed.

Significant gains for stockholders

Based on those historical prices, it is clear that essentially all shareholders will enjoy significant gains from selling the stock. While no statistics exist as to the weighted average basis of holders in the stock, we may address that issue by making the following assumptions:

- Trading subsequent to the acquisition offer, that resulted in a higher basis for some existing shareholders, was offset by sales and resultant taxable gains to earlier shareholders, whose decision to sell was triggered by the announcement.
- The basis to be focused on is that which existed prior to the announcement of an acquisition offer and its effects on the stock price.
- The midpoints of the historical trading ranges are 1971-86, $31.19; 1987, $52.80; and 1988, $68.06.
- The relevant basis, therefore, is probably in the low- to mid-40s, and we will assume $44 is a representative average.

This basis of $44 will be reduced by the $18 of group preferred stock resulting in an adjusted basis of $26 per share for a representative shareholder. The taxable gain to shareholders at time of closing

Epilogue to a Megadeal: $5.4 Billion in Sell-Offs

Since completing its going-private LBO in April 1989, RJR Nabisco Inc., by the close of 1989, had completed or announced divestitures at aggregate prices of nearly $5.4 billion. The principal sell-offs took the company out of the biscuit and snack food business in Europe, shed the Del Monte foods operation, and reduced the company's position in the confectionery field.

In order of size, the key deals included:

- European biscuit and snack operations, $2.5 billion — BSN SA of France acquired the British biscuit business of Nabisco Brands Inc.; Walker's Crisps and Smith's Crisps, U.K. snack food companies; Belin Group, French pastry and cookie firm; and Saiwa, snacks and cookies in Italy. BSN resold Walker's and Smith's to PepsiCo Inc. for $1.35 billion.
- Del Monte canned foods, $1.48 billion — RJR agreed to sell the business to DMPH Holdings Corp., led by Merrill Lynch and including Citicorp Venture Capital, Del Monte management, and Kikkoman Corp.
- Del Monte Tropical foods, $875 million — The fresh products business was sold to Polly Peck PLC of the U.K.
- Baby Ruth, Butterfinger, and Pearson candy, $320 million — Nestlé SA agreed to buy those confectionery lines.

On the domestic front, RJR also sold its Chun King Chinese food business to a joint venture of Yeo Hiap Seng Ltd. and Fullerton Holdings Pte. Ltd. for $51 million. Overseas, the company divested Spanish and Portuguese food operations to Tabacalera SA for $78 million; an interest in Associated Biscuit of India for $44 million; and Scandinavian food operations in a $20 million management buyout.

M&A

is $91 (taxable consideration received) minus $26 (adjusted basis) or $65 per share. Based on 226 million shares, the gross gain arising from the transaction is nearly $14.7 billion.

Our research established that in late 1988 42.2 percent of RJR shares were held by investing institutions, the largest blocks being 16.8-percent shares each held by banks and investment advisers. Sixty percent to 90 percent of the banks' holdings were tax-exempt as were 50 percent to 75 percent of the investment advisers' holdings. All of the 4.6 percent block held by "other advisers" was tax-exempt, but fully subject to all taxes were the 2.5-percent interest by insurance companies and the 1.5-percent interest by investment companies.

We have assumed that 28 percent of the holdings are on behalf of nontaxable institutions — which is slightly above the Treasury's estimate of 26 percent for all U.S. companies. When the $14.7 billion overall gain to stockholders is reduced by the amount attributable to tax-free institutions, the residual gain is nearly $10.6 billion. Based on the capital gains tax rate of 28 percent, the Treasury in 1989 should have received $2.962 billion in tax payments that it would not have gotten had the RJR acquisition not taken place.

RJR also had about 1,252,000 preferred shares outstanding that were acquired for $108 a share, or a total of $135 million. The price is well within the 1971-86 trading range of $100.50 to $126.75. The proceeds are taxable but since the amount is small, purchase of the preferred shares were treated as revenue neutral and not considered further in the analysis.

Another key issue is the cost to the Treasury resulting from deduction of interest on the acquisition debt.

Deduction of interest on acquisition debt

This question may be addressed by the following steps:

- Develop projections of future results for the company as if there had been no acquisition and an associated increase in debt;
- Based on these projections, estimate the federal tax liability for the company as if the acquisition had not taken place. Since the question relates to the impact on the Treasury, care must be taken to adjust (exclude) both foreign income taxes and deferred (noncash) taxes;
- Recalculate the federal tax liability to give effect to the deductibility of the interest expense associated with the acquisition; and
- Determine the annual net change in receipts to the Treasury.

*Projections by RJR Nabisco in acquisition documents

In material prepared for the acquisition, RJR projected a steadily increasing rate of pretax operating income over the next decade had there been no acquisition, with earnings rising from more than $2.3 billion in 1989 to about $7.4 billion in 1998 (See Column two of Table 1). As a result of the 1986 reduction in the maximum corporate tax rate to 34 percent, the projected current federal tax rate, adjusted for foreign and deferred taxes, is 22.5 percent. On this basis, RJR would have paid more than $10 billion in federal taxes between 1989 and 1998 (Column three of Table 1).

Step three, to reiterate, is the federal tax liability after deduction of the interest on the debt financing. The costs to buy all shares and to pay related fees and expenses was estimated at $20.3 billion. It was financed by $13.3 billion in senior debt supplied by banks; $3 billion in senior subordinated bridge financing from Drexel Burnham Lambert and Merrill Lynch; $2 billion in subordinated bridge financing from Drexel Burnham; $500 million in debt securities from a Kohlberg Kravis Roberts partnership; and $1.5 billion in equity contributions.

With about $10 billion of the bank financing priced at prime plus 1.5 points, we have estimated an overall effective interest rate of 13 percent on the $18.8 billion in debt.

To calculate the cash taxes paid to the Treasury after deduction of interest, we have assumed that acquisition debt will be reduced by the amount of net income after taxes and that all capital expenditures and foreign taxes will be funded from internally generated funds and net working capital. The results of these calculations are in Table 2.

Table 3 plots the difference in cash receipts to the Treasury between the tax payments due had there been no acquisition and the RJR tax bills following the acquisition. Note that as a result of the interest deductions, the Treasury's receipts over the 1989-98 period are reduced to about $4.3 billion from $10.1 billion.

Present value of the drain

In order to compare the effect of the net decline in cash taxes with the aforementioned gain of nearly $3 billion from taxes paid by shareholders, we must compute the present value of the reductions over the 1989-98 period. We have assumed a discount rate of 9 percent which approximates the recent cost of long-term Treasury issues. These calculations, presented in Table 4, present value the reduction at nearly $3.2 billion for the 10-year span.

At this point, the Treasury is slightly behind with the net present value of the interest deductions equaling $3.2 billion compared with $3 billion in gains from shareholder taxes.

A final component of the First-Order Effects is taxes on dividend income. RJR had been paying 55 cents a share in quarterly common stock dividends, or about $497 million a year, which, except for exclusions such as exemptions for nontaxable investors, would have been subject to taxes.

The tax lost to the Treasury by the elimination of this dividend stream will be offset, more or less, by taxes on dividends and interest income earned on reinvestments of the proceeds received by shareholders. Considering only the cash consideration of $81 per share to be paid at closing, approximately $18.3 billion was received by shareholders. The $497 million in dividends lost represents a return of 2.7 percent on the gross cash distribution. The gross proceeds that were reinvested in dividend and interest-paying securities probably were reduced by factors such as taxes and consumer expenditures, but it is reasonable to conclude that the effect on the Treasury is positive.

If we assume conservatively that only 50 percent of the cash proceeds were reinvested at a 9-percent average annual return (the approximate yield on long-term Treasuries), gross annual proceeds of approximately $824 million (dividends, interest, and capital gains) will be generated. This represents an increase of $327 million in annual gross proceeds from the old $497 million dividends, and, at a tax rate of 28 percent, additional annual receipts of $92 million to the Treasury. The present value over 10 years of this incremental cash stream, discounted at 9 percent, is $590 million, which represents a net gain to the Treasury.

In summary, the Treasury records a net gain of $390 million from the First-Order Effects — gains of $3 billion in shareholder taxes from the tender offer and $590 million from income on reinvestments of proceeds, reduced by $3.2 billion lost in deduction of acquisition debt interest.

Second-Order Effects deal with the impact on the Treasury of the interest income received by financial institutions providing debt financing for the RJR deal. Since they are one step removed from the immediate transaction, they require greater use of assumptions.

In order to provide some estimate of this income stream to the Treasury, we have made assumptions that we believe to be conservative in that they most likely understate the cash receipts to the Treasury resulting from taxes on interest income. The assumptions are:

- Institutions receiving interest income will have a ratio of operating revenue to operating expense of 1.16;
- Taxpaying financial institutions have an average current effective federal tax rate of 20 percent; and
- Seventy-five percent of the debt is held by institutions subject to federal income taxes.

Based on these assumptions, we calculated that the financing institutions should receive more than $18.9 billion in interest for the 1989-98 span and generate about $2.65 billion in operating income given the 1.16 ratio of revenues to expenses. With 75 percent of the debt held by institutions subject to taxes, the taxable operating income works out to about $1.99 billion. At a 20-percent tax rate, The Treasury's take is $397 million for the 10-year period.

Assessing the multiplier effect

The present value, again assuming a 9-percent discount rate, of this tax stream is $298 million, which represents the additional taxes paid by institutions as a result of financing the RJR transaction.

Additionally, the largest single expense for financial institutions is their cost of funds. In other words, they in turn pay interest to others to attract funds, and this interest in turn becomes taxable to the recipients. We have made no attempt to quantify this, but we believe that it serves to increase the cash receipts to the Treasury.

Third-Order Effects deal with the multiplier effect on the economy and, hence, that of funds reinvested by selling shareholders of RJR.

We previously assumed that 50 percent of the cash proceeds were reinvested in securities. This implies that approximately $9.1 billion is available to shareholders for payment of taxes and consumption expenditures. Tax payments were estimated as approximately $3.3 billion. That leaves available for consumption expenditures a total of $5.8 billion. Should our 50-percent assumption be erroneous and more funds were reinvested, the effect of this multiplier would be reduced (under Keynesian economic theory), but the favorable impact of the dividend stream would be increased.

Table 3: Net Change in Treasury Receipts as a Result of Interest Deductions Following RJR Nabisco Acquisition ($ Millions)

Year	Tax Receipts (No Acquisition)	Tax Receipts (Result of Acquisition)	Net Reduction

The "multiplier concept" is accepted by all free-market economic points of view. Under the Monetarist and Austrian theories of economics, as well as the "public choice" doctrine, a multiplier is any stream (income, dividends, etc.) favorable to the economy as a whole — i.e., funds that are reinvested.

A commonly accepted private investment multiplier is in the range of 2.0 to 3.0. If we tilt to the conservative side and apply a multiplier of 2.0 to the $5.8 billion available for consumption expenditures, we estimate that $11.6 billion in economic activity was generated as a result of the cash disbursements to shareholders in the acquisition. If the multiplier is 3.0, the favorable impact is greater.

How does the Treasury gain? The base for calculating receipts is economic and tax trends for 1985-87 when the gross national product aggregated nearly $12.8 trillion. Personal and corporate taxes came to about $1.28 trillion, or roughly 10 percent of the GNP. When this 10-percent ratio is applied to the $11.6 billion economic stimulus, the result is another $1.2 billion in additional taxes.

Finally, there are the Fourth-Order Effects dealing with cash flows accruing to the Treasury from postacquisition asset sales. As we may be looking 10 years ahead, this section admittedly is speculative and based principally on assumptions. Several asset sales already have been made and others are planned (see sidebar on page 48).

But to provide a unified frame of reference, we constructed an exit scenario that assumes that the entire company will be sold at the end of1998 at a conservative multiple of eight times trailing pretax income. If this occurs, RJR would be sold for $59.2 billion (well over twice the original acquisition price) or about eight times the previously cited projection of $7.4 billion in operating earnings for 1998. That would result in a taxable gain of about $35 billion from the acquisition price. If we assume that 80 percent of the gain is taxable at a 28-percent rate, cash proceeds to the Treasury would be about $7.8 billion with a present value of $3.6 billion.

Admittedly, a complete sale may not materialize and the company may continue to sell parts of the business. In that event, the taxable gains will be less than we have calculated but the effect of the discount factor also will be less. In any event, sales of operating assets have been accelerated by the LBO and should generate additional taxes.

In summary, the net gain to the Treasury over the next 10 years, according to our calculation, should be nearly $5.5 billion (Table 4). The only negative is a $3.2 billion loss from deducting interest on acquisition debt. The plus side shows about $8.7 billion in receipts from selling shareholders, reinvestments to increase the dividend stream, financing institutions, favorable economic effects, and asset sales.

That works out to $1.12 in taxes for every $1 lost as a direct result of the transaction. When indirect results are measured, the return is $2.72 in extra taxes for every dollar of decline. ■

These data, supplied by the M&A Data Base, ADP/MLR spotlight the positions of middle-market transactions and companies in the mergers and acquisitions marketplace. Middle-market deals valued between $1 million and $50 million, or having a target with sales between $1 million and $75 million. Middle-market acquirers are defined as those with sales between $1 million and $75 million.

dominant position, it must be prohibited. Earlier drafts of the regulation would have enabled the commission to grant exemptions if it was satisfied that the benefits of the merger outweighed its detriments. If the original thresholds had been retained, there was a very real concern that the commission would not have the necessary resources to operate the regulation effectively. That reservation still remains to some extent.

Equally, there are concerns that third-party competitors, suppliers, and customers will be disadvantaged in seeking to object to a merger because the Commission may well be able to provide those parties with important information supplied by the bidder or the target because it will be confidential. Indeed, when it comes to decisions under the regulation, one may expect blobs to appear wherever there is any reference to turnover or market share figures, thus reducing the precedential help of those rulings.

It is intended that the regulation will be the only EC antitrust control that will apply to "concentrations" as defined, whether or not they have a Community dimension. The commission is renouncing all of its other powers under Articles 85 and 86 in respect to such concentrations. This is good news for industry, since any concentration not having a community dimension will not be subject to commission interference. However, it is arguable that the regulation cannot prevent targets or third parties from relying on Articles 85 and 86 in the national courts. This renunciation is somewhat surprising since a number of such mergers may well create or strengthen dominant positions in the Community. ■

Decade In Review

Revisiting M&A Activity in the 1980s

90 THE M&A BONANZA OF THE '80S...AND ITS LEGACY
Merger, acquisition, and divestiture activity evolved during the 1980s from an opportunistic sometime-thing into a systematic market plied by a multiplicity of buyers and sellers, and serviced by an expert, innovative infrastructure. That market ranks as the principal inheritance of the 1990s generation of dealmakers.

If future m&a doesn't match the pace or the boldness of the 1980s, as suggested by dealmaking developments at the end of the decade, the functioning market should keep activity thriving for years to come as it reaches global proportions.

96 DEALMAKERS' PERSPECTIVE AT THE TURN OF THE DECADE
The world will be the m&a market of the 1990s, according to veteran advisers who were in the transactional forefront during the last decade. They see straightforward economics and old-fashioned fundamentals driving cross-border activity as the market relentlessly widens its scope.

100 DEALS AND MISDEALS
Epic transactions proliferated during the 1980s ranging from the RJR Nabisco grand slam to innovative approaches for playing on economic and financial trends. Others, led by the Campeau acquisition of Federated Department Stores, were memorable mostly as failures that often served as testimony to the financial excesses and misguided strategies that punctuated the feverish market.

104 THE M&A ENGINEERS
Scores of companies seized on mergers, acquisitions, and divestitures to drastically revamp their modes or configurations. While Allied-Signal metamorphosized from a commodity chemical company into a high-tech giant, Paramount Communications totally deconglomeratized. Others exited old core businesses or became major players in entirely new fields.

The M&A Bonanza of the '80s...And Its Legacy

Will the '90s Be an Encore for Dealmaking's Golden Age?

Martin Sikora

Yes, merger and acquisition activity was everything it was cracked up to be in the 1980s — more than 31,000 deals collectively valued at more than $1.3 trillion. To some, the troubles and lackluster dealmaking pace that tarred the end of the decade suggest the feast is over. But m&a has several aces in the hole — including the creation of a full-fledged buyer/seller marketplace.

MEGADEALS DIDN'T BEGIN in the 1980s. Neither did hostile takeovers, leveraged and management buyouts, corporate restructuring, deregulation, bust-up deals, relaxed antitrust policies, competitive bidding, evolving industries, junk bonds, the m&a service infrastructure, globalization, and foreign acquisitions in the U.S.

Why then were the 1980s, with all of those features and more, a watershed for merger, acquisition, and divestiture activity? What was so special about the 1980s that dealmakers could execute 31,105 transactions with an aggregate value of $1.34 trillion and fashion the most prolific sustained m&a wave in history? And why, after the decade of almost breakneck dealmaking ended with a pronounced slowdown punctuated by a discomforting number of deal miscues, do most signs indicate there is enough momentum to sparkplug brisk m&a activity well into the 1990s?

If a pervasive answer isn't as elusive as the meaning of life, there is no pat one either. But analysis of the various driving forces and byproducts of m&a produces one inescapable conclusion. The dealmaking generation of the 1980s was determined not to emulate the sometime-thing mentality of its predecessors. Mergers and acquisitions no longer would be cavalierly handled as hit-or-miss propositions or temporary phenomena cued by short-run economic and financial influences that ultimately fizzled out. The rewards were too lucrative, the techniques too strategically viable, the advantages too compelling for the modern dealmaker to let the ball drop.

For starters, the new generation sized up the myriad of influences inherited from the 1970s and prior periods as remarkable business opportunities. And they followed up with often-dazzling innovations that not only sustained and capitalized on existing trends but effectively spawned new ones.

At operating companies, m&a evolved from a purely opportunistic, sometimes seat-of-the-pants gamble to a systematic method for implementing strategic plans and a permanent arrow in the corporate development quiver. Savvy buyers, armed with carefully researched information and cold-eyed analysis, seized on mergers and acquisitions as fast, cost-effective ways of adding value to their companies and responding to critical needs or evolving conditions in their markets. Mergers and acquisitions could increase market shares, net new products, technologies, and markets, secure new talent, bolster marketing and distribution capabilities, branch into new geographical territories at home and abroad, even remold companies trapped in shopworn businesses and outmoded strategies. And through the mechanism of m&a, companies were able to sell off the businesses that no longer offered optimal fits with their long-range game plans. In fact, roughly 30 percent of all m&a activity in the 1980s involved sell-offs of corporate divisions and subsidiaries.

Eager buyers and sellers represented profitable pieces of the action for members of the far-flung service infrastructure. Investment bankers mobilized to help buyers find targets and sellers find buyers, guide negotiations, determine proper pricing, develop financially appealing and tax-advantaged deal structures, even match up companies that had no specific deals in mind. Commercial bankers responded with professional lending capabilities and syndicates, often international in scope, that could handle a cascade of ever-increasing deal sizes, all while developing their own expertise as intermediaries. Accountants honed their skills in tax strategies and due diligence. Valuation companies, law firms, and strategic planners added or expanded m&a capabilities. A vast network of m&a intermediaries emerged to assist small and mid-sized businesses buy and sell.

Mergers and acquisitions no longer would be cavalierly handled as hit-or-miss propositions or temporary phenomena cued by short-run influences that ultimately would fizzle out.

The service segment, lured by the prospect of even greater rewards, added significant icing to the cake by helping craft the incremental trends that further spiced m&a activity. The once-smallish leveraged buyout industry grew into a giant institution with financial and advisory spurs from investment and commercial banks and others. Hostile takeover artists turned into financial engineers with approaches fully as professional as strategic buyers. And the bankers themselves pushed hard into merchant banking where they bet their own capital as principals in the m&a transactions.

A market rumbles forth

In the process, the multiplicity of players created a full-blown, multi-tiered market — often termed the market for corporate control — that allowed dealmaking forces to be sustained and synthesized, to operate simultaneously to power m&a activity, and to adjust to changing conditions. Establishment of the m&a market may be the most enduring outcome of the 1980s m&a wave. The very fact that dealmakers of the 1990s have a functioning market in which to operate gives them a great headstart over their predecessors of 10 years ago and a well-entrenched foundation for continuing to fuel m&a activity in the next decade.

Aside from the sheer numbers, the 1990s dealmakers face a tall order in matching the singular exploits of the last decade that were made possible by the creation of a marketplace.

The m&a market reached a pricing zenith with the April 1989 completion of the $24.7 billion leveraged buyout of RJR Nabisco Inc. by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. In terms of size and degrees of leverage, the deal was virtually unthinkable not long before but it was done. Yet, it was doable because it married a host of marketplace forces — acceptance of large LBOs, an international banking combine in which nearly half the initial financing was supplied from Japan, an institutionalized market for high-yield bonds, a system for generating cash from divested business units, to name some.

Although less spectacular, many other deals and strategies mirrored the abundance of across-the-board opportunities afforded by m&a.

General Electric Co. plied the m&a market to shed its Utah International uranium mining business and a slew of other units while blending newly acquired operations, including RCA Corp., to concentrate its focus on high technology and financial services. Philip Morris Cos. Inc., faced with a potentially stagnating but high-cash-generating tobacco business, became a big player in foods with the acquisitions of General Foods Co. and Kraft Inc. In retailing, May Co. widened its base and gained desired economies of scale by acquiring Associated Dry Goods Co. Tired of being just one of several second-tier players in the computer industry, Burroughs Corp. merged with Sperry Rand Corp. to form Unisys Corp. in the hopes of being a more formidable competitor to the mighty International Business Machines Corp. General Motors Corp. moved beyond its automaking base by acquiring Electronic Data Systems, in data processing, and Hughes Aircraft, in defense and aerospace. Du Pont Co., in chemicals, and USX Corp., in steel, invaded the energy industry through huge acquisitions. Connecticut General Corp. and INA Corp. joined forces in insurance to form CIGNA Corp.

Procter & Gamble utilized acquisitions to enter into pharmaceuticals through Richardson-Vicks Inc., orange juice through Ben Hill Griffin, and cosmetics through Noxell Inc. The need for greater critical mass in the pharmaceutical industry prompted the mergers of SmithKline Beckman Corp. and Beecham PLC, and Bristol-Meyers Inc. and Squibb Corp. Deregulation spurred consolidation in the railroad and airline industries through mergers and acquisitions. And both federal deregulation and the scrapping of state lines as barriers to bank expansion touched off a still-continuing m&a wave in the banking industry with Citicorp, NCNB Corp., and PNC Financial Corp. being among the most active buyers.

Other companies dramatically changed their configurations and operating modes. Some were conglomerates that sold off nonrelated parts of their portfolios to concentrate on core businesses — including ITT Corp., Litton Industries Inc., and Teledyne Corp. Other onetime conglomerates went even further. Paramount Communications Corp., nee Gulf & Western, unloaded industrial and consumer products, cigars, agricultural operations, and financial services to concentrate on movies, publishing, and sports. And IC Industries Inc. became consumer-goods-oriented Whitman Corp. after shedding its railroad and industrial products businesses.

Retrenching and rationalizing

But non-conglomerates also went through metamorphoses. Allied Chemical Corp., an old-line commodity chemical, turned into defense and technology behemoth Allied-Signal Inc. after acquiring Bendix Corp. and Signal Cos. and divesting its traditional businesses. Ralston Purina Co. sold off its slow-growth, highly cyclical commodities businesses to become a marketing-driven company through acquisitions of Continental Baking (from ITT) and Eveready batteries (from Union Carbide Corp.)

While the big names may have generated the most publicized deals, smaller companies also angled for acquisitions that would help pace profitable, value-creating growth. Firms like AMETEK Inc., in technology, Bausch & Lomb, in healthcare products, Excel Industries Inc., in automotive components, and Hunt Manufacturing Co., in office and art supplies, found they could profitably expand their wares and their sizes through judicious acquisitions. And in one of the most classic cases of great growth through acquisition, Black & Decker Inc. expanded from its base in power tools to become a premier force in small household appliances by purchasing GE's housewares division.

Establishment of the m&a market may be the most enduring outcome of the 1980s m&a wave.

No small part of this strategic activity could be traced to dealmaking creativity from the service sector. When GM executed its non-automotive acquisitions, it utilized specially created "alphabet" stocks, traded separately from the parent and tied to the performance of the new subsidiaries. When Dow Chemical Co. took control of Marion Laboratories Inc. in a move to expand in pharmaceuticals, the unique deal structure minimized acquisition goodwill and created tradable securities that may provide additional compensation in the future. When tax-avoidance was a key issue to the sellers of the Waldbaum's supermarket chain, the acquisition vehicle was a partnership led by Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. Two-tier deals to reduce up-front cash commitments, debt securities as acquisition currencies, and innovative earn-out and contingent payment kickers were refined to a high art.

On the financial side, LBOs achieved megadeal status well before the RJR deal, often as a format for the restructuring of operating companies. The primary example was KKR's $6.3 billion acquisition of the overly diversified Beatrice Cos. followed by the massive sell-off of the target's consumer products; beverage; international foods; and industrial products businesses, boiling the firm down to a handful of mass-volume food brands. LBO buyers also were ready buyers of good corporate sell-offs, and that deal format often was a unique mechanism for allowing corporate managers to become virtually instant entrepreneurs through management buyouts. Investment and merchant banks became financial/LBO players via merchant banking, albeit with varying degrees of success. While Merrill Lynch scored highly with the buyout of Eckerd Drugs, it stubbed its toe with Fruehauf Corp. But Morgan Stanley, in conjunction with Jefferson Smurfit Corp., engineered the highly acclaimed purchase of Container Corp. of America from Mobil Corp.

Once-despised hostile buyers became a permanent force to be reckoned with. People such as Carl Icahn, T. Boone Pickens, Irwin Jacobs, and the Belzberg family of Canada formed the cores of professional organizations with the ability to sniff out values, obtain funding from mainstream sources, and secure the services of Wall Street's bluest-chip advisory organizations. Their deal successes can be numbered in the handful — with Icahn's takeover of ACF Industries, the Belzberg's acquisition of Scovill Industries, and Paul Bilzerian's victory at Singer Co. being among the most memorable. But their impact was far greater in the way many of their targets wound up being acquired by white-knight buyers. The most striking example was Gulf Corp. which, in trying to defense a Pickens bid, was purchased by Chevron Corp. for $13.3 billion in what still ranks as the second largest deal in history.

If creativity was a linchpin of activity, the m&a surge of the 1980s also enjoyed an unbeatable blend of exquisite timing and good breaks.

Mergers and acquisitions were at the forefront of industrial globalization as well, most graphically symbolized by the upsurge in foreign acquisitions of U.S. companies. A sampling would start with British Petroleum PLC's (U.K.) acquisition of Standard Oil Co. and the Royal Dutch/Shell Group's (U.K.-Netherlands) purchase of complete control of Shell Oil Co., in the petroleum industry. The log would move on to Hoechst AG's (West Germany) purchase of Celanese Corp.; Bridgestone Tire Co.'s (Japan) acquisition of Firestone Tire & Rubber Co.; and the acquisitions by Japan's Sony Corp. of CBS Records and Columbia Pictures Industries. Nor did some foreign buyers fear to go hostile — as evidenced by Beazer PLC's (U.K.) purchase of Koppers Co., Hanson Trust PLC's (U.K.) acquisition of SCM Corp., and Dainippon Ink & Chemical Ltd.'s (Japan) takeover of Reichhold Chemicals.

Moreover, the boldest hostile bid from abroad — F. Hoffman-LaRoche's (Switzerland) 1988 offer for Sterling Drug Inc. — led to Sterling's white-knight acquisition by Eastman Kodak Co. for $5.1 billion.

Exports to Europe

Intriguingly when the 12-nation European Common Market decided to create a unified economic community by the end of 1992, firms on the Continent and in the U.K. seized on m&a as the mechanism for staking out important strategic positions in the widely expanded business territory.

If creativity was a linchpin of the foregoing activity, the m&a surge of the 1980s also enjoyed an unbeatable blend of exquisite timing and good breaks. Certainly, human talent made the most of timing elements by capturing often-unrelated developments for dealmaking purposes. In a specific deal, for example, Eastman Kodak was located as a ready buyer for Sterling Drug, because pharmaceuticals were in its long-range game plan. Commercial bankers deftly built their m&a lending capabilities when more traditional sources of loan demand offered much less tempting returns. Investment banks similarly took to more extensive m&a practices to cushion themselves from the volatility of the stock market.

But the m&a market could not have pushed beyond predictable bounds without a strong dash of luck.

Not for six decades had there been such an accommodating antitrust policy. Prior to the Reagan administration, assert many observers, there may not have been a Chevron-Gulf, a GE-RCA, or even a deal like the Texaco Inc. acquisition of Getty Oil. But they add that relaxed antitrust policies actually have had the strongest impact on corporate restructuring, a movement facilitated by the great freedom of divesting companies to sell businesses to competitors.

The judiciary, warmed to the concept of shareholder ownership of corporations, produced a litany of decisions favorable to sales of companies when shareholder value could be maximized. Institutionalization of the stock market created a class of share owners eager for the opportunity to profit from takeover opportunities and to sell into attractive offers. And shareholder value became a rallying cry for corporate change that promoted both acquisition and divestiture activity.

Changing investor tastes were still another stimulus. Junk bonds, stamped with the imprimatur of premier investment houses, came into widespread acceptance, even among conservative investors. They were quickly pressed into m&a service to refinance LBOs and hostile bids and ultimately, as exemplified in the RJR deal, as an acquisition currency to stretch a buyer's cash resources. LBOs, taking shape as relatively short-term investments aimed at selling or otherwise cashing out five to seven years down the road, became magnets for money from investors seeking returns superior to more traditional stock, bond, and real estate investments. An estimated $25 billion to $30 billion has been assembled by LBO sponsors for equity investments in their deals. Hostile bidders, as well, were supported by investor pools.

The plenitude and diversity of well-heeled, eager buyers and willing sellers produced another unique hallmark of the market — competition. Few desirable businesses that went on the block were sold without spirited bidding or closed auctions conducted by investment bankers that drew spates of contenders. Many companies or divested businesses, as a result, were sold at prices that were often beyond comprehension.

The silver lining is tarnished

But one of the strongest testaments to the vibrancy of the m&a market was its resiliency. The decade was hardly one of unqualified success. Dealmaking activity did not move in a straight-upward line. Setbacks — ranging from individual deal misfires to more pervasive problems, such as insider trading, elimination of tax advantages, and the 1987 stock market crash — punctuated the entire decade. Yet, each time, the m&a market bounced back.

Although only an inferential aspect of m&a activity — often described as a sideshow to the main event — insider trading was a curse that the m&a market had to bear. The machinations that sent dealmaker Dennis Levine and arbitrager Ivan Boeskey to jail, disgraced m&a impresario Martin Segal, triggered the massive Drexel Burnham Lambert case, and tarnished dozens of other reputations were rooted in trading on takeover stocks. But largely because insider trading was a fringe activity, the m&a market survived and progressed.

Predictions that m&a activity would enter its death rattle when Congress repealed the General Utilities doctrine in 1986 and subjected many deals to double taxation also proved to be premature. Innovative deal structures to minimize the tax impact exploded and the market moved on. And the pattern was repeated in each succeeding year that Congress chipped into the former tax advantages enjoyed by m&a transactions.

Perhaps the biggest test of the status of m&a as a market emerged with the stock market plunge of October 1987. Widely forecast ripple effects included a drying up of m&a lending, a crash in junk bonds, reluctance of sellers to be bought at reduced prices, and reduced acquiring by companies nervous about the future economy. But the m&a market adjusted to new conditions and dealmaking resumed at a brisk rate.

However, the decade ended on a series of bleak notes that will challenge the mettle of dealmakers and the m&a market in early 1990.

Some high-flying deals began to unravel. Canada's Campeau Corp. was forced into bankruptcy under the crushing debt load assumed in the leveraged acquisition of Federated Department Stores. Bankruptcy also overtook Jim Walter Corp., the building materials firm taken private by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, and a number of other leveraged deals looked to be in trouble.

The junk-bond market soured, temporarily depriving financial dealmakers of a source of quick money. Lenders, partially in response to the deal miscues and junk-bond woes, and partially in fear of how the uncertain economy will unfold, took a more conservative posture in parting with funds. European companies concentrated on their home fronts while strategic American buyers showed some reluctance to move without further clues on the economic outlook. Competition eased and pricing dropped, discouraging many potential sellers from marketing their properties. There were signs that the Time-Warner decision by the Delaware courts, which gave companies more freedom to reject acquisition offers, would halt many potential deals in their tracks.

The decade ended on a series of bleak notes that will challenge the mettle of dealmakers and the m&a market in the 1990s.

Thus, the 1990s began with a dealmaking malaise. Critics and not a few m&a supporters placed the blame on excesses in pricing and deal structuring that characterized the late 1980s. Others stated that many buyers and sellers are either shell-shocked by the turn in fortunes or satiated by the breakneck activity of the last decade.

But if the establishment of m&a as a full-fledged market meant anything, the turn-of-the-decade troubles should have been of relatively short duration. The decline in activity should have been a pause while the market adjusted to new and possibly less lush conditions. And as a market, it had the ability to adjust. When all of the sensationalism is stripped away, the sobering fact is that many of the forces that drove m&a in the 1980s were still in place — changing industries, globalization, restructuring, the strategic advantages of acquisitions, and the service infrastructure, to name some.

While the big names may have generated the most publicized deals, smaller companies also angled for acquisitions that would help pace profitable, value-creating growth.

An immediate return to the most hectic days of the 1980s looked to be remote. Many observers believed, for example, that divestitures peaked in the 1980s, although sales of corporate divisions and subsidiaries won't dry up by any means. Given the conservatism of lenders, the riskier financially driven transaction will be hard to execute. Merchant banking may be less aggressive. But sources of m&a activity were still plentiful. Strategic buyers with the financial means and the incentives of more moderate pricing were expected to lead the market out of the doldrums. And given the institutionalization of LBOs and financial transactions, that side of the business also was expected to rebound along with an altered, somewhat restrained high-yield-bond market.

Only time will tell whether the 1990s will replicate the 1980s in the m&a market in terms of activity, innovation, and other characteristics. Change is an element common to every market, and how the m&a market adjusts to new problems and challenges will determine how it evolves in the coming decade. The ability to adapt served the m&a market well in the 1980s and should be a major force for sustaining it in the 1990s. And who knows what new influences will emerge to impact the market place.

If the environment in early 1990 wasn't ideal, m&a was a hardly a wasteland. The situation may be best described by a paraphrase of the Neil Young rock and roll classic: m&a is here to stay. ■

Dealmakers' Perspectives At the Turn of the Decade

Back to the Basics In International Dealmaking

Looking forward is always more challenging, interesting, risky, and rewarding than looking backward. However, much of what can be expected in the 1990s will build on two important trends of the decade just ended.

First, the 1980s saw the ascendancy of the financial buyer. While clearly there are problems associated with certain deals done later in the decade, the major lesson taught by financial buyers is that when securities markets drastically undervalue businesses or when a different way of managing a pool of assets will create value for both the current and future owners of these assets, the pressures to realize fundamental values are inexorable and irresistible. While the methods used to create these realizations change, and will continue to change, the lesson learned will remain.

Second, globalization became a buzzword of the 1980s. In the 1990s, the world will continue to shrink. One can tune in CNN in a London hotel room while Rueters' data flow freely in Los Angeles. Japan finances the U.S. budget deficit while Boeing builds airplanes for the Far East. Western Europe progresses toward a unified market by 1992 while Eastern Europe struggles to reattach itself to the West. Certain newly industrialized countries will no longer deserve the "newly" part of their moniker while certain less-developed countries will move up to N.I.C. status.

The clear target of the 1990s in m&a is the international deal, at times executed with esoteric financial engineering, more often driven by old-fashioned commercial logic and relatively straightforward financing techniques. This will logically follow from the way business around the world is viewing its future and how sophisticated investors now look for investment opportunities. Success in the 1990s will come to those with existing competitive advantages, such as superior products, strong market positions, good distribution, and capital, who can combine these advantages with an understanding of how to export where appropriate, how to import when desirable, and how to execute around the globe. This will be as true for financial service firms in the merger and acquisition business as it is for manufacturing and marketing companies.

Fuel From the Global Reallocation Of Asset Ownership

The mergers and acquisitions story in the U.K. has been one of unparalleled growth and drama. The business made headlines as never before, notably with the emergence of the megabid for some of the largest household names. But the headlines only touch the surface of a truly burgeoning industry, where the number and values of deals of all types have leapt year by year, notwithstanding annual predictions that the bubble must burst.

Will this growth continue in the next decade? Overall, prospects for world economic growth remain good and the international corporate restructuring process can be expected to continue with Continental and Japanese companies joining their U.S. and U.K. counterparts as major players in the global reallocation of asset ownership.

In the U.K., a fundamentally positive political, economic, and stock market environment can be expected, notwithstanding current economic difficulties. Neither is the migration of competition jurisdiction over large mergers to Brussels likely to prove a significant break on m&a activity in the U.K.

In essence, the U.K. m&a industry has broadened and deepened and come of age. Acquisitions and disposals are now an institutionalized part of business life, driven by aggressive management teams determined to redefine and grow their businesses. This has been encouraged by an equally aggressive investment banking community, willing as never before to commit capital to ensure the success of transactions.

While m&a volumes will inevitably fluctuate, and while the growth patterns of the last five years would be difficult to repeat, there is good reason to believe that m&a activity will remain at high levels for the foreseeable future.

It's Time for Some Players To Clean Up Their Acts

Mergers and acquisitions in the 1980s exceeded almost everyone's expectations, whether regarding the number of transactions, their size, the advent and temporary decline of truly financial buyers, or the range of industries and countries affected. Strategic acquisitions and divestitures have provided the ongoing undercurrent of business, while financially driven raids and LBOs highlighted the gap often present between market and takeover values. European and Japanese investment and the return of financial buyers promise much of the excitement for the 1990s.

My continuing concerns are that too few transactions work out well for the corporate acquirer and that the infrastructure of advisers pushes too hard for quick deals with high fees and occasionally unethical practices.

Investing in Businesses For Long-Range Value

The 1980s could be called a number of things regarding the mergers and acquisitions marketplace:

- ☐ The recapitalization of American industry
- ☐ The birth of megadeals
- ☐ The period of skyrocketing prices
- ☐ The years of cash flow lending
- ☐ Leverage and Debt
- ☐ The emergence of the investment group as a major buying force
- ☐ The selling of U.S. assets to foreign investors.

I think, overall, more good than bad came out of the 1980s. We had undervalued and underutilized assets. We had management becoming complacent and not responding to the growing international competition. We had financial institutions still loaning money with a 1940s attitude. A lot of that changed, much of it attributable to the merger and acquisition activity during this period.

But what will also be remembered by me was a wave of preoccupation with doing deals, many times for the wrong reasons. A concentration on generating wealth as opposed to making a contribution in the marketplace. Buying for the purpose of reselling at a profit over a short period rather than building value over a long period. Moving away from an investment philosophy to one of a trading philosophy. Concern over repaying debt as opposed to investment in future r&d. Breaking long-term loyalties and relationships in favor of opportunistic ventures. Personal greed being a driving force as opposed to doing the right thing.

I am concerned about the direction we will take in the 1990s. Yes, there will be less leverage used in the future and more equity. That's fine and healthy. But what about the reasons that cause people to take action? Will we be doing it for the right reasons with a long-term view? Will we be sensitive to the full range of responsibility that owners and managers of businesses have in servicing their marketplace, their customers, their employees, their community, as well as their shareholders?

The Japanese Graduate To First-Rank Buyers

As a Japanese banker specializing in mergers and acquisitions, reflecting on the events of the past few years is no easy task. The market for these transactions has evolved at a heady pace, and Japan specifically has experienced nothing less than acute change. The year 1989 in particular, the "gannen" or first year of the Heisei Era, will be remembered as the year that Japanese m&a graduated and took its place in the world ranks.

Until recently, Japanese companies have been painfully shy when it came to making foreign acquisitions. Their lack of experience in this arena in conjunction with their traditional aversion to unfriendly business combinations has kept them on the sidelines and they have typically only become involved when invited to participate. Even large transactions, such as Seibu Saison's acquisition of Intercontinental Hotels or Bridgestone Tire's purchase of Firestone, were relatively straightforward and concluded on a friendly basis; they did not attract much public scrutiny.

The turnaround in 1989 has been dramatic. Sony's acquisition of Columbia Pictures and Mitsubishi Estate's purchase of part of Rockefeller Center reflect a new willingness to enter the fray. Although negotiated on a friendly basis, these deals represent a new conviction that they are now accepted as necessary in order to compete in a global market.

Even more significant in 1989 were the developments on the home front. T. Boone Pickens' minority investment in Koito and Polly Peck's acquisition of a majority stake in Sansui augur well for a boom in domestic transactions, both friendly and not so friendly.

Now that Japanese companies feel more confident internationally, we fully expect that they will be tempted to flex their m&a muscle more in Japan as well as abroad. Therefore, despite the apparent slowdown in U.S. m&a, we are anticipating that 1990 will mark the beginning of yet another boom in m&a transactions. Japanese-related deals, whether domestic or international, will fuel that growth.

A More Thoughtful And Less Frenetic Environment

While there will continue to be a shake-out in the merger market, including bankruptcies of poorly structured deals in which buyers have overpaid for acquisitions, we nevertheless appear to be headed in the direction of a more thoughtful and less frenetic m&a environment. This observation is borne out of the following three trends:

- The bust-up, financial raiders and the greenmailers have largely left the takeover scene. Some are plying their trade in Europe. Others simply cannot obtain financing to put their targets in play. A number of financial raiders find themselves stuck with a potential loss on a minority position where they had purchased the shares believing they could force their target's hand.
- In a number of industries, cooperation between labor and management has provided the foundation to redistribute ownership to various constituencies, including labor, often in the context of going private. Weirton Steel started the trend several years ago. Northwest Airlines is a more recent example. UAL offers an excellent reminder of both the challenges and the potential opportunities of an alliance between labor and management.
- Negotiated transactions have a much greater chance of being consummated today without intervention. The Time-Warner decision in Delaware, coupled with the increased difficulty of obtaining financing, translates into less willingness on the part of an interloper to try to break up a friendly deal.

In particular, the Time-Warner decision affords directors the freedom to consider the long term, rather than be forced to submit under pressure to the highest price of the moment.

In conclusion, the absence of troublemakers, the prospect of further labor-management cooperation, and a limited threat of intervention to friendly transactions will contribute to a more stable, less confrontational m&a environment — an environment in which companies have a much greater chance of pursuing their strategic goals through acquisition without the need to constantly look over their shoulders.

A Clear Strategy and Access to Risk Capital

We ended the 1970s with acquisitions playing an interesting but less urgent phenomenon in corporate life. The Japanese and European stock markets 10 years ago were barely developed, compared with that in the U.S. And in 1979, the market capitalizations of all publicly quoted companies were: U.S., $906 billion; Europe, $405 billion; and Japan, $274 billion.

But you must compare those figures to the gross domestic product in each area to have a feel for the relative importance of the public equity markets to the productive process. GDP in 1979 was $2,444 billion in the U.S., $3,340 billion in Europe, and $936 billion in Japan.

By the end of the 1980s, we were looking at completely different relationships and orders of magnitudes. Market capitalizations were $3,002 billion in the U.S., up 213 percent for the decade; $2,152 billion in Europe, up 432 percent; and $3,195 billion in Japan, up 1,329 percent. GDPs were $4,807 billion in the U.S., a growth of 95 percent for the decade;

Europe, $5,177, or 55 percent growth; and Japan, $2,804 billion, or 204 percent growth.

If Europe is to successfully take advantage of the real internal market opportunities that are now being created, then the growth in production that it could achieve in the 1990s might at least rival that achieved in the 1980s in the U.S., even if the Japanese targets seem remote.

Such growth will need to be funded, and it is the Americans and the Japanese who currently have the equity resources to take advantage of these opportunities.

Apart from the British, whose very open stock market grew by 456 percent in the 1980s and still represents over a third of the total value of all European public stocks, much will need to be done by the other Europeans to give proper access for their companies seeking equity to take advantage of the "new order." This is particularly so in France and West Germany where so many nationally important companies still remain in private hands. Unless such businesses can open their capital bases and either acquire or be acquired, they will not achieve in time the scale that the new European market dimensions may require.

Mergers and acquisitions in Europe, therefore, will need to be driven by a clear strategy and with adequate access to risk capital. Only then will the nationalist approach of the '60s and '70s give way to the new European opportunities of the '80s and '90s.

These are exciting times for investment bankers with good local experience and a sound European vision.

Enlisting Local Expertise In the Burgeoning Cross-Border Market

I foresee a continued growth of cross-border m&a activities in the 1990s. A large number of m&a deals on the Continent will occur with private companies. Many owners of companies built up after World War II are moving to retirement age, have no successors, or are simply ready to sell their companies because their size is too small to compete on a European or global scale.

Cross-border transactions are complex because of different tax, legal, or regulatory rules and because of different country cultures, languages, and ethics. Companies will need local expertise to successfully close such transactions. Therefore, those banks with an extensive European network will be the key players in this cross-border market.

Deals and Misdeals

A Sampling of M&A Hits and Strikeouts in the 1980s

RJR Nabisco: The Biggest Score of All

What dealmaking log of the 1980s could not start with the $24.7 billion transaction that shattered all records not only for leveraged buyouts, but for all of m&a? But lofty price aside, the deal completed in April 1989 carried enough innovations to write a textbook of its own. The concept of international financing of epic acquisitions was institutionalized when foreign banks — notably the Japanese — supplied nearly half the initial financing. Use of high-yield debt and PIK securities as acquisition currencies was advanced to the most sophisticated form. And there was even a mechanism for converting debentures into common stock and returning the food and tobacco company to public ownership in four years.

Dow Chemical – Marion Laboratories: A Way to Have it All

No stone was left unturned in the 1989 deal that gave Dow two-thirds control of pharmaceuticals producer Marion Laboratories. A tender offer that netted 39 percent of Marion's stock was followed by a merger of Dow's Merrell Dow pharmaceutical subsidiary into Marion for another block of shares. The result: a larger, stronger, more competitive drug company that operates independently of Dow and can obtain its own value in the public market. An added sweetener for stockholders that stuck with Marion is the Contingent Value Right that entitles them to cash in if shares of the newly constituted Marrion Merrell Dow don't reach targeted levels in 1991 or 1992. A final benefit to Dow was the securing of tax advantages by the minimization of acquisition goodwill.

Time Inc. – Warner Communications: The Corporate Strategy Defense

The 1989 merger of media giants Time Inc. and Warner Communications Inc. was the centerpiece of one of the bitterest takeover battles of the 1980s. But its more-lasting impact may be its contribution to a new chapter in m&a legal history. To execute the $8.1 billion transaction, Time had to fight off a rival bid from Paramount Communications Corp. and needed a favorable decision from the Delaware courts. The ruling — that public companies did not have to accept acquisition offers if their own strategic plans offered shareholder value enhancements over a somewhat longer term — not only cleared the way for Time and Warner to combine but legalized a new defense for besieged targets of unwanted bids.

QFB Partners – Petrolane: Lending a Helping Hand

QFB stands for Quantum Chemical and First Boston and it's a partnership that brought a new dimension to the consortium acquisition that teams a financial and a strategic buyer. Petrolane Partners, producer of propane gas, was strategically tempting for Quantum, which already owned arch-competitor Suburban Propane, when the business was put on the block in 1989 by Panhandle Eastern. The problem: Quantum had just executed a leveraged recap and was too encumbered by debt to swing the deal alone. The solution: do the deal, priced at $844.5 million, in tandem with First Boston, with an option to take over Petrolane completely when finances ease.

Park Ridge – Hertz: Protecting a Market

The versatility of m&a was underscored in the 1987 divestiture of Hertz Corp. by Allegis Corp., which was selling off the car rental company in a restructuring that ultimately would pare it down to its core airline business. The buyer, which anted up $1.3 billion, was an obscure entity, Park Ridge Corp., and it was formed especially to make the deal. But there was no mystery about Park Ridge's chief stockholder, Ford Motor Co., nor its reasons for taking control of Hertz. The huge rental company was Ford's biggest customer and the automaker was eager to protect its business.

Quaker-Stokely – Van Camp: Nectar of Success

When Quaker Oats paid the munificent sum of $220 million to acquire Stokely-Van Camp in 1983, skeptics screamed overpayment. But Quaker never looked back. Stokely's primary attraction was the undermarketed energy drink Gatorade and in Quaker's hands it became one of the consumer goods stars of the 1980s. With new packages, new flavors, and vastly widened distribution, Gatorade has more than paid the acquisition cost several times over.

Chevron – Gulf: Gold in the Oil Patch

Until the RJR Nabisco deal, Chevron Corp.'s 1984 acquisition of Gulf Inc. for $13.3 billion was the largest transaction in history. It still is the largest white-knight deal of all time.

Chevron came to Gulf's "rescue" when it was trying to repulse a bid from T. Boone Pickens. If the deal, a straight cash offer, was methodologically unremarkable, it nonetheless confirmed the ability of big strategic buyers and their bankers to settle on a deal and mobilize the necessary funding almost overnight. By not drawing a challenge from the Justice Department, which let the deal pass after Chevron had agreed to some postacquisition selloffs, the transaction also underscored the extent of relaxation in antitrust enforcement.

Dow Chemical – Texize: Persuading a Reluctant Seller

Dow's 1984 acquisition of the Texize household cleaning products line from Morton Thiokol Inc. has been one of the prize deals of the 1980s, judging by its postacquisition performance. Texize was a crown jewel that Morton Thiokol really didn't want to sell. But Dow made Morton take notice by purchasing a block of its stock, suggesting that a takeover offer was imminent. When Morton caved in it received $131 million in cash — plus Dow's holdings of 1.4 million shares worth $125.3 million. Cynics credited Dow with advancing greenmail to a high art but the technique rarely was emulated by aggressive buyers in later years.

Gibson Greetings: The Ground Floor of Valuation Arbitrage

Stripped of all its fabled trappings, the leveraged buyout of Gibson Greetings in a 1982 divestiture by RCA Corp. was an early example of the successful buy-low, sell-high strategy that thrived in the bristling m&a market of the 1980s. The buyer, Wesray Corp., paid only $80 million to acquire the greeting card manufacturer from RCA Corp. The deal netted many millions more for former Treasury Secretary William Simon and his Wesray mates when Gibson was taken public the following year. With the stock market's penchant for "pure plays," the Gibson deal demonstrated how individual parts of a company could be more valuable on a stand-alone basis than they were to the parent.

The Metromedia LBO: Great Wealth in Breakups

The art of valuation arbitrage was lifted to a more sophisticated level in the $1.1 billion leveraged buyout of broadcaster Metromedia Inc. in 1984 by a group led by CEO John Kluge. The company's shares were considered undervalued and the firm better off in private hands. But the demand for Metromedia broadcasting and other communications properties was so strong and the offering prices so generous that the new owners wound up selling practically all the businesses. Kluge himself became a billionaire.

The Beatrice LBO: Restructuring in Private

Generally utilized as an investment vehicle through the early 1980s, the leveraged buyout moved to the cutting edge of corporate restructuring techniques with the $6.3 billion acquisition of Beatrice Cos. by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. in 1986. Following the deal, the overly diversified company sold off a host of businesses, including soft drink bottling, bottled water, printing, industrial products, international foods, car rentals, and financial services, and took a package of food and consumer products public as E-II Holdings. By the turn of the decade, Beatrice was down to a handful of major food brands — i.e., Hunt's tomato products, Wesson oil, Swift meats — and hoping to sell them as well.

SmithKline – Beecham: The Global Merger

At the end of the decade, SmithKline Beckman Corp. of the U.S. and Beecham PLC of the U.K. were two middle-range pharmaceutical companies in search of the great critical mass to compete in their rapidly globalizing industry. Their joint solution was a 1989 merger, valued at $8.3 billion, through an exchange of shares. It was the first large "merger of equals" between a U.S. and a foreign company. Its legacy is a potential prototype for future cross-border combinations of big companies, especially when the huge cash cost of a straight acquisition threatens to strap the buyer.

...And the Misdeals

Campeau – Federated Department Stores: Over the Edge

Campeau Corp. of Canada and its aggressive chairman, Robert Campeau, had a grand plan in mind after nailing down the contentious acquisition of Federated Department Stores in a $6.5 billion leveraged transaction in 1988. It was to combine Federated's prize stores with those of Allied Stores, acquired in 1986, blend in Campeau's real estate expertise, and create a vast merchandising and real estate empire that included scores of newly developed shopping malls. By the end of 1989, the dream was shattered and the company in tatters as the U.S. retailing units went into bankruptcy and Campeau himself was forced out.

What went wrong in the deal that has been cited as the epitome of m&a excess in the 1980s? Almost everything. Leverage in the Federated deal, stretched to the maximum and piled atop the debt lingering from the Allied deal, left Campeau with virtually no margin for error. When pricing in the m&a market turned down, Campeau was unable to generate the level of proceeds needed to slash big chunks off the debt load. And when consumer spending ebbed in late 1989, cash flow for debt service also was crimped. Choice retailing properties, spearheaded by the Bloomingdale's chain, now are up for sale as Campeau tries to work out of its financial mess.

IBM – ROLM: Communications Breakdown

Infrequent acquirer International Business Machines Corp. broke stride with the $1.3 billion purchase of ROLM Corp., producer of PBX switching exchanges, in 1984. The deal was designed to put IBM in the forefront of the coming convergence of computer and telecommunications technology. But by the end of the 1980s, the convergence had yet to develop on a commercially viable basis. Facing huge expenses in the telecommunications market and the need to concentrate funds on its core computer business, IBM sold ROLM to Siemens AG in 1989.

Beatrice – Esmark: Too Much to Handle

Beatrice Cos. doled out $2.7 billion to buy Esmark Inc. in a 1984 deal that was designed to create a food industry giant with the size and breadth to make it in an industry that was simultaneously maturing at home but offering growth prospects abroad. Beatrice, whose former strategy of managing some 300 smallish profit centers was beginning to unravel, couldn't cope with its big, new property, and culture clashes exacerbated the troubles. Beatrice ultimately had to extricate itself from its problems via a restructuring LBO two years later.

Merrill Lynch – Fruehauf: Black Eye for Merchant Banking

When it became apparent that the $1.5 billion, white-knight LBO of Fruehauf Corp. by a Merrill Lynch-led bank wasn't working out, some observers suggested that the big truck trailer manufacturer would have been better off in the hands of raider Asher Edelman who put the firm in play. While struggling with its huge debt load, the company ran into a trucking industry slump just after the 1986 buyout and had problems in servicing the debt. Competitors were able to capitalize on the troubles by taking business away. At the end of the decade, much of Fruehauf had been sold off and the divestiture process still hadn't ended.

Hillsborough Holdings LBO: An Unlikely Casualty

Building materials maker Jim Walter Corp. looked like a sound LBO candidate when it was acquired by the KKR-crafted Hillsborough Holdings for $2.4 billion in 1988. By late 1989 it was in bankruptcy. The company ran into asbestos-related problems, a slump in construction, and — the final straw — refusal of creditors to restructure debt.

LTV-Republic Steel: A Strategy Gone Astray

Combination of two large steel manufacturers — LTV Corp. with its Jones & Laughlin operation and Republic Steel Corp. — seemed to make sense in an industry that was consolidating to reap efficiencies and create stronger competitors that could battle heavy flows of imports. Moreover, the deal, executed in 1984 with a $486.4 million value, was the first significant merger to win Justice Department okay on the grounds it would create efficiencies. But the dream never materialized. LTV had too much debt to make the most of the combination, and steel prices slipped. By 1986, LTV was in bankruptcy, and parts of the steel business subsequently were sold off.

Revco DS LBO: Trouble in Paradise

Revco DS may be forever remembered as the first big leveraged buyout not to make it. The big Midwest-centered drug store chain was in bankruptcy only two years after completion of the management-led $1.3 billion buyout in 1986. A debt structure that left no grace period for interest payments, a price war launched by competitors, and a less-than-robust economy in its operating territories combined to staunch cash flow and crater the deal.

Westinghouse – Unimation: The Future that Didn't Arrive

Westinghouse Electric Corp., an old-line electrical equipment manufacturer, saw a chance to move up the technology ladder in a growth field by acquiring robotics star Unimation Inc. for $107 million in 1983. But the potential never materialized as factory automation based on use of mechanical robots did not proceed as fast as expected, and development costs mounted. Unimation was divested in 1989 to Stabuli International.

Standard Oil – Kennecott: Hostage to the Cycles

Dozens of deals were executed in the late 1970s and early 1980s by oil companies that were eager to get into new businesses because they feared worldwide oil supplies were drying up. Few worked out, and the Standard Oil Co. acquisition of copper giant Kennecott Corp. for $1.8 was among the monuments to those failures. Like Standard Oil, the petroleum firms that branched into other natural resources wrongly assumed that they could extract any mineral from the ground and they dangerously increased their reliance on cyclical, volatile commodity products. Right after the Kennecott deal, copper prices plunged into a prolonged slide and Kennecott endured a marathon of red ink. Standard Oil was taken over in 1987 by British Petroleum PLC. □

Mergers and Acquisitions as Agents of Great Change

AS A RESULT of extensive use of mergers, acquisitions, and divestitures, scores of companies looked vastly different at the end of the 1980s than they did going into the decade. Here are a few:

■ Allied-Signal Inc. — The company, nee Allied Chemical, began the 1980s as a producer of old-line commodity chemicals and ended the decade as a high technology-oriented, electronics, aerospace, and automotive products business. Divestitures and the spin-off of a grab bag of businesses into Henley Group swept out the old. Acquisitions of Bendix Corp. (at the conclusion of a bitter Pac-Man battle between Bendix and Martin Marietta Corp.) and Signal Cos. formed the core of Allied-Signal's new mode.

■ Paramount Communications Corp. — Once the quintessential conglomerate Gulf & Western Industries, the company began peeling off diverse operations in the mid-1980s to become a more focused business. Out went industrial, automotive, and consumer products; agriculture; and, eventually, the huge Associates financial services operations. In its new guise, the renamed concern produces movies, publishes books, operates sports teams, and is on the hunt for acquisitions in the entertainment and media fields. Designs on Time Inc. were shattered in 1989 when the Delaware Courts gave the target the right to reject Paramount's offer.

■ Ralston Purina Co. — Tired of being dominated by the low-margin,volatile foodstuff commodities business, Ralston Purina converted itself into a marketing powerhouse for consumer brands. Old-line businesses were disposed of and Ralston seized on the chance to acquire two famous names being cut loose by other restructuring companies. Continental Baking was purchased from ITT Corp. and Eveready batteries from Union Carbide Corp. as the bases for Ralston's new strategic thrust.

■ B.F. Goodrich Co. — Retreat emerged as the best approach to dealing with B.F. Goodrich's dilemma in its core tire business. The combination of intensifying competition, maturity, globalization, and increasing size and strength of rival tiremakers was too much to hack. Initially, the tire business was combined with that of another trouble-ridden manufacturer, Uniroyal. But Goodrich eventually sold its share of the joint venture. It is now focused on specialty chemicals and automotive products.

■ American Stores Co. — With supermarket chains concentrated in the East, the Southwest, and the Rockies, American Stores wanted nothing less than nationwide coverage to become a powerful force in its industry. It was willing to go hostile to achieve its goals. The strategy worked when American Stores hung in to buy Jewel Cos. in the Midwest and Lucky Stores on the West Coast after contentious bouts with reluctant managements.

■ Philip Morris Cos. — The giant tobacco company found itself on a horns of unusual dilemma by the mid-1980s. While its core business faced a no-growth future because of mounting concerns over the connection between smoking and health, it was nonetheless generating massive amounts of cash that cried for profitable reinvestment. The food industry was chosen as the escape hatch for both.

Philip Morris plunged in with the acquisition of General Foods, in packaged and frozen foods, and later added the extensive Kraft Inc. dairy operations to become one of the nation's largest and most diverse food processors.

■ PNC Financial Corp. — Few banking organizations have taken more aggressive advantage of the virtual scrapping of state lines as barriers to expansion than PNC Financial, which didn't even exist when the 1980s started. The holding company was formed in 1983 to own Pittsburgh National Bank and Provident National Bank of Philadelphia, neither of which was the leader in its home market. A relentless acquisition pace not only widened in-state coverage to northeastern and northwestern Pennsylvania but swept up Citizens Fidelity in Kentucky, Central Bancorporation in Ohio, and Bank of Delaware. With assets in excess of $43 billion, PNC is the 14th largest bank holding company in the U.S.

■ Du Pont Co. — The nation's largest chemical company became a major player in the oil industry as well with the $6.8 billion acquisition of Conoco Inc. Although not the first deal priced at more than a billion dollars, the 1981 transaction nonetheless is considered the pioneer megadeal of the 1980s. Will Du Pont continue to shoulder two primary businesses in the 1990s? Executives indicate that serious consideration is being given to divesting energy operations and refocusing on chemicals and healthcare products.

■ Stone Container Corp. — Small but scrappy Stone Container Corp. saw enormous opportunities for the company willing to bet on the mundane paper box and bag industry and it used acquisitions to make them pay off. Executing a stepping-stone strategy, Stone was a ready buyer for businesses placed on the block by companies less enamored of the prospects and capped off the spree with the acquisition of Canada's Consolidated Bathurst. At decade's end, Stone was the world's largest producer of container board and related products with an international global presence and the wherewithal to be top gun in the mature but globalizing industry.

■ General Electric Co. — The 1980s was a decade in which GE evolved from a traditional maker of electrical products into an organization that featured high technology and financial services laced with a strategy of being a leader in each of its markets. As old-line and marginal businesses were sold off, GE advanced its technological prowess with such acquisitions as RCA Corp. (that also moved the company to the forefront of broadcasting) and the performance chemicals business of Borg-Warner Corp., and expanded in major appliances with Roper Corp. On the financial services side, Employers Reinsurance provided penetration of the insurance field and Kidder, Peabody, entry into investment banking, among other deals.

■ USX Corp. — Known as U.S. Steel Corp. at the start of the 1980s, the company began and ended the decade as the nation's largest steel manufacturer — albeit with a major twist. USX also became a major energy firm with the acquisitions of Marathon Corp. and Texas Oil & Gas. In fact, it was logging more revenues from energy than from steel by the late 1980s. USX also has been active in restructuring with divestiture of several steel properties and support services, such as its captive railroad. More recently, a large part of its oil and gas reserves were put on the block.

■ Quantum Chemical Corp. — This company took its present shape when the management of National Distillers & Chemicals decided to accentuate the latter and eliminate the former. The liquor business was sold to American Brands Inc. which, coincidentally, wanted to expand from being a niche player to a front-rank competitor. Quantum later divested its Emery special chemicals business and now focuses on polyethylene and other general chemicals and propane gas, a business expanded with the purchase of Petrolane Partners. The company gained further notoriety by executing two leveraged recapitalizations in two years to dish out excess cash dividends to shareholders.

■ CBS Inc. — Only a handful of core businesses — the mighty CBS TV and radio networks and a clutch of stations — survived one of the most extensive corporate cleanouts of the 1980s. The company's days as a diversified media giant were numbered after it executed a partial leveraged recap to repulse a bid by broadcasting magnate Ted Turner, and in-house fighting led to assumption of control by conglomerateur Laurence Tisch. To become a broadcasting pure play, CBS sold off its book publishing, records, and music publishing operations among others. Flush with billions in cash, the company is said to be looking for acquisitions but, by the end of 1980s, none of great magnitude had been done. □

Cooper Industries Inc. — acq. — Cameron Iron Works Inc.
Houston, TX — Houston, TX
Revenues: $4,258,300,000 — Revenues: $501,579,000
Net Inc.: $224,400,000 — Net Loss: $5,388,000
Year End: 12-31-88 — Year End: 6-30-88
Terms: Cooper Industries acquired Cameron Iron Works in a tax-free transaction valued at $700 million. Under terms of the definitive agreement, Cameron shareholders are entitled to receive one Cooper convertible exchanageable preferred share for every five Cameron shares held. Each share of the new Cooper preferred stock has an $8 annual dividend and initially is convertible into 2.75 Cooper common shares. This represents a dividend rate of $1.60 and a conversion rate of 0.55 of a Cooper share for each Cameron share. After five years, the Cooper preferred would be exchangeable by Cooper for Cooper convertible subordinated debentures, or would be redeemable by Cooper. The agreement also provided that Cameron issue its 7-percent convertible subordinated debentures, due 2012, in exchange for all of its outstanding $3.50 cumulative convertible exchangeable preferred on September 15, 1989. The transaction was subject to approval by Cameron shareholders. Principal stockholders of Cameron, who had the right to vote about 53 percent of Cameron's outstanding common stock, had agreed to vote in favor of the transaction. The initial dividend on the new convertible exchangeable preferred stock will accrue from November 29 to December 31, 1989. The amount of the dividend will be $0.71 per share and was payable on January 1, 1990, to holders of record on December 11, 1989. Quarterly dividends of $2 per share will be paid thereafter.
Principals: Cooper Industries manufactures electrical and electronic products, compression and high-drilling products, tools, and various products, including switches, controls, cable fittings, aviation lighting, traffic signals, wrenches, screwdrivers, scissors, hammers, and clamps. It also manufactures windows, window dressings, blinds, shades, and accessories. Cameron Iron Works designs, manufactures, and markets oilfield tools and equipment, including manifolds, wellhead equipment, casings heads, ball valves, choke manifolds, and pipeline connector equipment. It also makes forged products, including turbine parts, landing gear components, ordnance forgings, and blowout preventers. Its Oil Tool division makes pressure-control equipment used at the wellhead in the drilling for and production of onshore and offshore oil and gas.

Review/Preview: The Age of Global Dealmaking

Companies that want to or must compete globally will be on the acquisition trail in strong numbers during the 1990s. That seems to be a major given in an m&a market still reeling from shock waves touched off in late 1989 and hunting for its next wellspring of dealmaking power. The betting is that industrial globalization will be the primary force in halting the early 1990 drift.

ROUNDTABLES

31 Perspectives on Strategic Transactions in 1990
Globalization and strategic acquisitions should be the primary spark plugs of m&a activity in the 1990s.

41 Perspectives on Financial and Hostile Transactions in 1990
Assessing the competitive position and strength of the players in the financial segment of the m&a market.

MIDDLE MARKET

11 Middle-Market Report: The middle market widened its share of m&a activity in 1989. Deals priced at less than $500 million accounted for nearly half of all completions.

INTERNATIONAL

12 M&A: European companies acquired across the Common Market as they jockeyed for premier positions in an economically cross-border m&a unified landscape.

17 Worldscene: The Japanese are the late bloomers of the international m&a scene. However, they came on strong in 1989 with 81 deals worth more than $9 billion.

M&A REPORTS

20 Washington Update: American banks retrenched further in leveraged lending when regulators handed down a definition for such transactions.

21 Financing: High-yield bonds have lost their zing in financing m&a transactions. But the mainstream m&a market can operate very well without them.

23 M&A Players: Drexel Burnham Lambert never developed a broad-based m&a practice. Had it survived, the firm may have found it hard to remain a kingpin in its junk bond, leveraged, and hostile specialties.

25 Tender Offer Update 1990: It was a tough time for tender offers in 1989. The number of bids fell 37 percent and the decline in hostile bids was steeper.

27 Credit Ratings: As industrial globalization widens and more foreign companies acquire, they can get caught in the credit rating squeeze that long has afflicted American buyers.

28 Trends and Findings: A final touch to many 1989 mergers and acquisitions was a change of the corporate name to symbolize increased size and scope. About half the 1989 name changes resulted from m&a.

29 Out the Window: The number of broken deals rose 24 percent in 1989, with the UAL buyout being the most notable casualty. But the failure rate remained low.

30 Restructuring: All but a handful of the companies spun off in 1988 and 1989 were reluctant to become m&a players. Initial emphasis for most newly independent firms was on internal finances and operations.

A Solid Base for M&A

The small and mid-sized transactions slightly increased its share of the m&a market category, as total dealmaking slipped in 1989, according to indications from the Mergers & Acquisitions Data Base, ADP/MLR Publishing. However, transactions valued at $100 million or more continued to account for the largest single category in the m&a pricing spectrum.

Deals priced at $25 million and below represented 47.2 percent of total transactions, up from 45 percent in 1988. When the price limit is expanded to $50 million, 61.1 percent of all transactions are included, against 59.4 percent the year before.

At the same time, 26.8 percent of the 1989 transactions were valued at $100 million or more. The share, however, was down marginally from 28.6 percent in 1988.

While small and mid-sized deals did not escape the 1989 downturn in m&a activity, the middle market held up better than most segments. Nearly half of the year's completions were priced below $50 million.

Backbone of the market

The analysis covers 1,018 transactions that were completed in 1989 and were straightforward mergers and acquisitions, purchases of majority or remaining interests in the targets, and complete divestitures. The 1988 base of such deals is an upward revised 1,303, and all 1988 figures were adjusted to reflect the changes. The data include only deals for which prices were announced.

In one respect, the data at least tacitly confirm that the small to middle-sized deal remains the backbone of the m&a market and accounts for the bulk of activity. The figures also suggest that the middle market held up a bit better than the high-priced segment. For example, the number of deals priced at $25 million and under slipped 18.1 percent between 1988 and 1989 while the number at $50 million and less was down 19.6 percent. At the same time, deals of $100 million or more plunged 26.8 percent. And the total of all deals used for this analysis was down 21.9 percent.

However, the impact of the middle market may be even greater than can be confirmed. Price disclosure in smaller and mid-sized deals is sporadic at best and the data, by obviously excluding many transactions without announced prices, tend to obscure the clout of the middle market. By contrast, the shares assigned to bigger deals may skew their numerical influence because buyers and sellers tend to reveal their prices in the bulk of these transactions.

One of the middle market's relative strong points in 1989 was divestitures. Of all the deals counted for this analysis, 46.2 percent were corporate sell-offs in 1989 and 43.4 percent in 1988. Total divestitures slipped by 16.7 percent, compared with 25.6 percent for straight acquisitions and, as previously noted, 21.9 percent for all deals.

The small to mid-sized divestiture was less affected than other deals by the overall erosion of the m&a market. Sell-offs priced at $25 million or less fell only 6.6 percent between 1988 and 1989, and in one price bracket — $10.1 to $15 million — there was an actual increase. Divestitures priced at $50 million and under were down 11 percent. That compares with a 27.5-percent plunge for divestitures worth $100 million and over. Here again, the data may have something of a shortfall in that divestitures, regardless of size, often are executed without announced prices. The key determinant in many cases is whether the seller or the buyer believes the deal is "material."

In the straight acquisition area, however, the middle market generally fell in line with other m&a categories. Acquisitions priced at $25 million and less plunged 25.2 percent. Deals valued at $50 million and under dropped by 25.4 percent.

Europe's Shopping Spree

by Garrick Holmes

As Common Market unification drew closer, the projected survivors drove hard to gain required size and breadth through acquisition. Deals got bigger and big deals became more frequent with chemicals, insurance, autos, and food among the pace-setting industries.

As the 1980s gave way to the 1990s, the U.S. and European m&a markets seem headed in opposite directions. In the U.S., the decade-long takeover binge subsided in 1989 as leverage artists, undercut by the collapse of junk bonds, abandoned the field to strategic buyers at what should be more realistic prices. Meanwhile in Europe, where the market has always been mainly strategy-driven, the volume and prices of deals continued upwards as corporate dealmakers, responding to the logic of increasingly international markets, intensified their restructuring efforts.

In the process, the competitive line-up in key sectors of European industry underwent some dramatic changes.

- In food and beverages, while France's BSN poured billions into acquisitions across Europe, other large and small players joined in the fray. According to Translink, which tracks international deals, the food sector alone registered 101 cross-border deals, totaling $7 billion, plus another $1.5 billion in drinks and tobacco.
- The automotive industry was not far behind, with $5.6 billion changing hands in 40-odd deals. In swift succession, Ford captured Jaguar while General Motors snared Saab, paying luxury prices for entrée to the luxury car market. In heavy trucks, Germany's MAN doubled its market share by acquiring Enasa in Spain and Steyr in Austria.
- In insurance, France's Suez/Victoire group was assembling a pan-European empire to rival Germany's mighty Allianz, which counterattacked with a big move into France. Meanwhile, other French insurers were expanding aggressively in the U.K. and Italian markets.

Creation of the banking colossus

- The banking and finance sector registered close to 100 cross-border deals, led by Deutsche Bank's white-knight takeover of U.K. merchant bank Morgan Grenfell. Apart from the U.K., much of the activity was focused on Italy and Spain, where French, German, and British bankers were all staking claims.
- The electrical and electronics industry attracted well over 100 transactions, including such showpieces as the Siemens/GEC carve-up of Plessey, the attendant merger of GEC and Alsthom in power equipment, AT&T's coup in Italy, and U.S. General Electric's foray into Hungary. Meanwhile the Swiss/Swedish giant ABB continued to set a furious pace of dealmaking throughout Europe as well as in the U.S.
- In the paper and packaging sectors, the U.S.' International Paper moved strongly into Europe through a trio of major acquisitions. Cross-border consolidations led to the creation of two new European market leaders: James River/Ferruzzi/Nokia in tissue paper and Carnaud/Metal Box in metal packaging.
- Chemicals and pharmaceuticals together accounted for some 120 deals totaling over $4 billion. France's state-owned Rhône-Poulenc and Orkem set the pace in chemicals (although Orkem itself was broken up at year-end in a reorganization of the French industry) while the SmithKline-Beecham trans-Atlantic merger triggered a major shake-up of the global pharmaceutical industry.
- Construction materials saw an aggressive drive into southern Europe by France's two biggest cement producers, Lafarge-Coppée and Ciments by Français, as well as Aker of Norway.
- In publishing and communications, U.K. groups were at the center of the action, most often as sellers. In publishing, Collins succumbed to a hostile bid from Rupert Murdoch while Century Hutchinson and Gollancz went to friendly U.S. buyers. In music, Island Records was sold to Philips/Polygram and Virgin brought in a Japanese partner, Fujisankei.
- In business services — advertising, accounting, consulting, and the like — cross-border deals proliferated as national and international players rushed to extend their European or global networks.

The slowdown in U.S. dealmaking was primarily a domestic phenomenon. According to the M&A Data Base ADP/MLR Publishing, the total value of transactions completed in 1989 was $231 billion, only marginally below the previous year's record $237 billion, but the number slipped from 4,001 to 3,412. Foreign purchases in the U.S. (mainly European as well as Canadian and Japanese) rose slightly from 515 to 521, although total spending was down 15 percent to $64 billion.

As ever, U.K. firms led the parade of European buyers into the U.S. Among the more notable deals were the Beecham/SmithKline Beckman merger, WPP's successful run at ad agency Ogilvy, British Telecom's 20-percent stake in McCaw Cellular Communications, Unilever's purchase of Fabergé cosmetics, and Bass' agreed bid for Holiday Inn hotels. Other major European acquisitions were ABB/Combustion Engineering, Michelin/Uniroyal Goodrich, and Siemens/Rolm.

What was new in 1989 was the sharp increase in acquisitions by U.S. companies abroad, especially in Europe. The M&A Data Base shows an increase from 180 to 243 completed transactions around the world, with the total value doubling to $14.4 billion. Looking at deals announced during the year in Europe, Translink comes up with 74 U.S. purchases totaling $15.3 billion. In value terms, U.S. firms thus moved to the head of the list of cross-border buyers in Europe.

U.S. giants are starring

The list of major U.S. corporations acquiring in Europe was a long one, headed by the likes of Ford and GM, AT&T and GE, Emerson Electric, DuPont, Gillette, and International Paper.

Japanese buyers were also turning their attention to Europe, accounting for 55 deals valued at $1.7 billion. At least seven Japanese firms made purchases in the $50-million-and-over range, including Fuji Photo Film, Bank of Yokohama, and Mitsubishi in the U.K.; Kao Corp. in Germany; Ajinomoto and Asahi Life in Belgium; and Nomura in Spain. Though overtaken by U.S. acquirers, the French were once again the most active buyers within Europe. According to Translink, they generated 168 deals with disclosed values of $10.7 billion. The ongoing French shopping spree was led by BSN, Suez/Victoire, Carnaud, Rhône-Poulenc, Lafarge-Coppée, Crédit Lyonnais, GAN, Thomson-CSF, and numerous others.

But the big news in 1989 was the arrival of the Germans with 129 cross-border deals; in value terms they ranked third with $7.4 billion. Siemens, Deutsche Bank, Südzucker, and Allianz all closed deals of $1 billion-plus, while other sizeable acquirers included Benckiser, WestLB and Dresdner Bank, MAN, and Daimler-Benz.

U.K. firms led Europe in number of deals (282), but most of these were smaller transactions with total disclosed value of $6.1 billion. The closest to a megadeal was the $840 million takeover by Scottish & Newcastle of Center Parcs, a Dutch operator of holiday villages.

On the seller side, the U.K. was again the prime m&a market, whether in number of deals (238) or disclosed value ($23 billion, compared with $4 billion to $6 billion each for runners-up Germany, France, Italy, and Spain). Britain attracted 19 percent of all cross-border deals, representing 46 percent of disclosed value — though the latter figure is somewhat inflated by the fact that deal prices are more often revealed in the U.K.

Once again, the most spectacular takeovers were purely domestic affairs. The biggest cross-border deal, GEC/Siemens' $3.2 billion joint bid for U.K. electronics firm Plessey, was overshadowed by several intra-country mergers or takeovers.

The U.K.'s Consolidated Gold Fields, exhausted by its epic struggle to escape the clutches of South Africa's Minorco, succumbed quickly in June 1989 to a record $5.7 billion bid from experienced predator Hanson.

France's Suez posted another record in August 1989 with its $4.1 billion hostile takeover of insurance group Victoire.

German heavyweight Daimler-Benz, in September 1989, finally won approval to take over MBB, which was folded into Daimler's new Deutsche Aerospace unit with sales of $8 billion.

In Italy, the launching in June 1989 of Enimont, ranked tenth in the world chemical league with sales of $12 billion, inaugurated a stormy and possibly short-lived marriage between state-owned Enichem and Raul Gardini's Montedison.

At year-end came Sweden's largest-ever-transaction, the $3.8 billion takeover by state-controlled Procordia of Volvo's food and drug units Provendor and Pharmacia.

Big-league numbers

By any count, the pace of cross-border dealmaking in Europe is still accelerating rapidly. Translink counted a total of 1,275 deals in Europe during 1989, with aggregate (disclosed) value of just over $50 billion. This is broadly confirmed by accountants KPMG, whose total for the EC countries comes to 1,314 deals worth $50 billion. These figures compare with our own estimate of $28 billion to $30 billion for 1988.

The number of major transactions also is growing. In 1989, M&A Europe logged 13 megadeals of $1 billion or more (up from six the previous year), another 72 topping $100 million, and 43 in the $50-100 million range. Although a number of large deals went through at undisclosed prices, most of the remaining 1,100 or so — about 90 percent of the total — fell in the middle-market category of deals below $50 million. □

The Buy Sign From Japan

While imbedded cultural traditions continue to retard development of a pervasive mergers and acquisitions market in their home country, Japanese companies are quickly shedding any inhibitions about buying abroad — particularly in the U.S.

On the basis of trends for 1988 and 1989, the Japanese have arrived as major players in the American m&a market. Japanese companies logged 81 full or partial acquisitions in 1989 with a value of $9.4 billion. The number of deals expanded nearly threefold and the dollar value more than sixfold from 1987, and the Japanese took second place among foreign buyers, trailing only the British who historically have set the pace for inbound transactions. Numerically, dealmaking surged from the level of 48 in 1988 when the dollar value of Japanese acquisitions, swelled by three deals priced at $2 billion or more, hit a high-water mark of nearly $12 billion.

Several other major deals in the works in early 1990 kept the Japanese momentum going. These included Mitsubishi Estate Co.'s $846 million purchase of a 51-percent interest in Rockefeller Group Inc., Fujisawa Pharmaceutical Co. Ltd.'s $773 million acquisition of LyphoMed Inc., and Mitsubishi Chemical Co.'s participation in the management buyout of Aristech Chemical Corp.

Japanese companies are shedding tradition when it comes to buying overseas. They were second only to the British in acquiring in the U.S. during 1989

It the trends suggest that the Japanese have systematically seized on acquisitons to press global strategies and secure bases in the lush North American market, they also have been beneficiaries of an enormous break not enjoyed in their home land. In the U.S. and several other countries, they have found open markets in which selling businesses not only is common but often considered a mark of success or a logical way to enhance shareholder or owner value. Conversely, selling is alien to Japanese tradition and generally is regarded as emblematic of failure and a loss of face.

The vast majority of the 1989 transactions — 53 — were in manufacturing, but Japanese acquisitions have cut across the industrial spectrum.

The Junk Bond Fizzle

Dropping prices and the souring of some highly leveraged deals devastated the junk bond market in late 1989. But even at their most publicized peak, high-yield bonds basically were peripheral players in financing m&a transactions.

At the start of 1989, the junk bond market appeared to be the very model of an unstoppable machine. Once a fringe element in the capital markets, junk bonds, by the late 1980s, had come in from the cold to settle well within the financial mainstream. New issues were marketed and supported by top-rank financial institutions, led by Drexel Burnham Lambert, which created an institution- alized and systematized corporate and m&a finance subset. Ready buyers included even conservative investors eager to snap up hefty yields at supposedly minimized risk. In the m&a market, junk bonds fortified corporate raiders, undergirded merchant banking, and supplied the funds to finance LBO megadeals.

By the end of 1989, the junk bond market was in shambles. The fall from grace was precipitous. The high-yield market buckled under the pounding of economic uncertainty, erosion of bond prices, collapse of such junk bond-financed deals as the Campeau Corp. acquisition of Federated Department Stores Inc. and the Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. acquisition of Jim Walter Corp., and shrinkage of demand from traditional buyers. Newly issued bonds either had no takers or had to offer astronomical yields that made them economically unfeasible for m&a transactions. And prime mover and shaker, Drexel Burnham Lambert, was a financial wreck, its junk bond losses exacerbating the weaknesses resulting from a long and costly insider trading bout with federal regulators.

Data supplied by the Deal Financing segment of the Mergers & Acquisitions Data Base, ADP/MLR Publishing, confirm that junk bond financing related to mergers and acquisitions fell hard in 1989. But the data further suggest that while junk bonds fueled some segments of the m&a market, they did not pack the overpowering clout to drive m&a activity across the board. High-yield securities to finance m&a transactions totaled $15.2 billion in 1989, down from $21.5 billion in the high-volume year of 1988. That's a drop of about $6.3 billion, or a whopping 29 percent. The number of deals utilizing junk financing suffered an even steeper fall — to 103 in 1989 from 162 the year before, for a decline of 36.4 percent. The sole measure to grow was the value of all junk-financed deals. Dollar value rose 21.5 percent to $58.7 billion from $48.3 billion, but only because the $24.7 billion leveraged buyout of RJR Nabisco Inc. was included in 1989 figures.

Thus, in 1989, junk was used to finance only 3 percent of the year's total of 3,412 m&a completions. Because junk-financed deals tended to be larger than most, they took a much greater share of total dollar value. But even then, the proportion of transactions backed by junk securities accounted for but 25.4 percent of the $230.7 billion total value of all deals. If RJR is excluded, moreover, the proportion contracts to 16.6 percent. And the actual junk financing was only 6.5 percent of aggregate deal values.

The pattern was not much different at the 1988 junk bond peak. Junk-financed deals accounted for 4 percent of all 4,001 m&a transactions and the value of all junk-supported transactions took a 20.4-percent share of the aggregate dollar volume of $236.4 billion. Junk financing itself represented only 9.1 percent of total purchase prices.

Qualitatively, junk bonds had a greater impact than the numbers alone imply. They allowed raiders to operate systematically, intensified m&a market competition by providing hostile and financial buyers with access to large pools of money, and helped escalate deal sizes and pricing. But the figures demonstrate that by far the largest amount of m&a activity was executed outside the junk bond market and that m&a and high-yield bonds were not inextricably intertwined. They also indicate that m&a activity can rebound without a parallel recovery in junk securities.

Incidentally, divestitures represented about a third of all junk-financed deals — 54 in 1988 and 33 in 1989. But the shares of the dollar values represented by dispositions were much smaller — $9.14 billion, or 19 percent of the m&a junk financing in 1988 and $9.9 billion, or 16.9 percent in 1989.

Divestitures accounted for most of the disclosed leveraged buyout transactions in both 1988 and 1989. In 1989, sell-offs represented 203 of 338 LBOs. But their dollar value of $13.5 billion was only 21.9 percent of total LBO volume of $61.6 billion. The 1988 divestiture subset included 204 of 378 LBOs. Their dollar value was $17.1 billion, or 36.4 percent of the $46.9 billion in total LBO volume.

As a result, only a sixth of the LBO divestitures were done with junk financing in 1989, and a quarter in 1988. However, the dollar value shares suggest that junk was a rather strong force in financing the larger leveraged sell-offs.

At the same time, junk-financed dispositions were but 2.9 percent of all 1,119 corporate sell-offs in 1989 and 4.2 percent of the 1,273 divestitures the year before. In dollar value terms, junk-backed transactions took a 16.3-percent share of the $60.8 billion divestiture volume in 1989 and 10.9 percent of the $83.2 billion value of 1988.

Thus, even in the divestiture area, high-yield bonds helped get some deals done but were not a mainstream financing force.

Tender Offer Update: 1990

One key sign of the virtual idling of hostile buyers within the mergers and acquisitions market in late 1989 emerges from an analysis of the year's tender offer activity. Overall, the number of tenders dropped 37.4 percent from 1988, in line with the slowing of general m&a activity. However, the number of contested tenders dropped even more precipitously — by 110.7 percent. As a result, the share of total tenders represented by hostile or contested bids accounted for only 22.5 percent of all 1989 tenders, down sharply from 29.8 percent in 1988 and the smallest proportion in recent years.

Hostile activity contributed to, but did not alone account for, the decline in all tender offers. That was principally a function of the slippage in the general m&a market. Yet the breakdown underscores an interesting anomaly. The vast majority of tenders are friendly, not hostile. But tenders are the almost exclusive weapons of hostile bidders because they can bypass resistant corporate boards and go directly to shareholders in a hurry. Thus, if hostile bidding is down, tender offer volume indeed will be dragged.

The total number of tenders fell to 124 in 1989 from 198 the year before (see Table 1). The decline was sharper than the 14.7 percent slippage in overall m&a completions to 3,412 in 1989 from an upward revised 4,001 in 1988. In both years, tenders, as is traditional, accounted for only a fraction of total activity. The 72 completed tenders of 1989 represented only 2.1 percent of all deals while the 146 completed tenders in 1988 accounted for but 3.6 percent of all completions.

But tender offers took a much larger share of dollar volume. The value of all tender bids in 1989 was $106.9 billion, down 30.5 percent from $153.9 billion in 1989 (see Table 1), or less than the decline in total tender offers.

Tender offer activity suffered a sharper drop in 1989 than overall m&a dealmaking. Both friendly and hostile buyers were bit by the downturn in the market.

Combined values for the 10 largest tenders alone came to $69.8 billion, or 30.2 percent of the $230.7 billion dollar value for all completions (see Table 2).

Led by the $24.7 billion leveraged buyout of RJR Nabisco Inc., the largest m&a transaction in history, tenders accounted for six of the year's 10 largest deals plus one other transaction that had not been officially completed by the end of 1989 — Time Inc.'s $12.6 billion acquisition of Warner Communications Inc. The 10 largest tenders were among the 18 largest m&a transactions of the year.

Although stock-swap mergers enjoyed a rekindled popularity in several large 1989 deals, not a single 1989 tender offer utilized stock as an acquisition currency. The vast majority, as is usual, involved cash. But in 1989, the proportion of all cash offers dropped to 75 percent from 88.9 percent in 1988. Meanwhile, combination offers — packages of cash and securities — increased numerically, to 31 from 21, and widened their share of tender acquisition currencies to 23.4 percent from 10.6 percent.

*Acquisition of majority interest

That trend suggested some tendency to make greater use of non-cash alternatives in tenders, although not to bypass cash altogether.

There was some initial difficulty in gauging tender offer success rates because an unusually large number of bids were still pending — basically because the deals had not been completed — at the close of 1989 (see Table 3). Twenty-five of the 96 uncontested bids and 11 of the 28 contested bids were listed as pending. Most of the 25 pending uncontested bids were being completed in 1990 and that should substantially raise the success rate. Two-thirds of the friendly offers, or 64, were completed and only seven fell through, largely because the prices of initial bidders were topped by competitors.

Despite the difficulties in mounting hostile bids, successes were notched in eight of the 17 contested offers that reached some conclusion. A contested bid is defined as any offer that meets some resistance from the target. Often, the contest doesn't last long and the deal ends up friendly when the bidder raises the price.

In the largest successful contested deal of 1989, WPP Group PLC of the U.K. paid $830 million to acquire Ogilvy Group Inc. which gave up a long battle to stay independent after the bid was raised to $54 a share from $45. Dow Jones & Co. Inc. had to calm a "family squabble" to buy out the 33.8 percent of Telerate Inc. that it didn't own for $681.9 million. An initial offer of $18 a share was rejected as inadequate but the deal finally was sealed at $21 a share.

Other contested bids that reached completion included the P.A. Bergner & Co. acquisition of Carson Pirie Scott & Co. for $396 million; Penn Traffic Co.'s $296.6 million purchase of Big Bear Inc.; Vitro SA's acquisition of Anchor Glass Container Corp. for $269.2 million; the Applied Power Inc. acquisition of Barry Wright Corp. for $118 million; and Barry-Wehmiller Co.'s $15.8 million purchase of Pneumatic Scale Corp.

One other deal that was technically "successful" but never consummated was the $305.5 million agreement for Vernitron Corp. to buy Kollmorgen Corp. After Kollmorgen gave up a bitter battle and accepted a sweetened offer from Vernitron, the buyer demanded revisions in the deal and the accord was scrubbed.

The tender data reflected some relief in the pressures to pay massive premiums to complete deals — although the 1989 breakdown suggested the big premiums still were very much in vogue (see Table 4). Two out of every five tenders in 1989 carried premiums of 50 percent of more. However, this represented a smaller proportion from 1988 when three out of five tenders posted premiums of 50 percent or better. The most noticeable contraction was at the very top where one in 10 deals had premiums of 100 percent or more in 1989 compared with one in five the year before. The biggest growth proportionally was in the 10-25 percent range which accounted for one out of five deals in 1989 and only one out of 12 in 1988. □

Missteps in Dealmaking

Given the sophistication of lead players and their supporting casts in the mergers and acquisitions market of the 1980s, megadeals aren't supposed to falter at the last minute. But that is exactly what happened in October 1989 when the rug was pulled out from under the $6.8 billion leveraged buyout of UAL Corp. after months of painstaking efforts to put the complex deal together. It was the largest deal of recent years to fall through after everything seemingly had been signed and sealed.

The coup de grace came when a group of Japanese banks backed out of an agreement to commit billions to the transaction by a consortium including unions and management, of UAL and British Airways PLC. The bankers disliked UAL's business plan in the face of economic uncertainties and were turned off by the money to be made by management, as well as the opposition to the buyout by the machinists union. Although efforts were being made to get a deal back on track, no accords were imminent by early 1990.

Ganging up on deals

The breakdown of the UAL deal was the most dramatic manifestation of the retrenchment by bankers in the financing of highly leveraged transactions — a conservative posture taken in response to both economic uncertainties and the unraveling of some high-priced leveraged deals. It was one of several forces adverse to dealmaking that developed in late 1989. Others included the plunge in the junk bond market, the Time-Warner decision in Delaware that gave target companies more leeway in rejecting bids, and growing sophistication of antitakeover defenses, often with the support of favorable court decisions.

Not unexpectedly, the rate and number of deal failures, at least for publicly announced bids and agreements, increased. The number of aborted transactions logged by the Mergers & Acquisitions Data Base, ADP/MLR Publishing, climbed to 273 in 1989 from 228 in 1988, a rise of 24 percent. The rise was steeper than the 14.7 percent drop in m&a completions to 3,412 from 4,001. Yet, there was only one failure for every 12 completed deals last year, not as good as the one-for-20 rate of 1988 but a favorable comparison with historical trends.

To be included on the casualty list, a proposed deal must have been publicly disclosed in some way, i.e., announced negotiations that proved fruitless, a preliminary agreement that could not be converted into a definitive accord, rejection of an announced bid by a target, etc. The failure log includes cases in which an actual agreement with an initial bidder was scrubbed because the price was topped by another buyer but excludes simultaneous competitive bids in which one or more bidders lost. The list, of course, cannot include the contemplated deals that may have involved confidential negotiations or offers that were never announced, and, in some cases were dropped because of the multiplication of tough m&a market conditions in late 1989.

The UAL deal was one of 19 that ran into financing problems. Another large transaction with a similar snag was the proposal by Qintex Ltd. of Australia to acquire MGM/UA Communications Co. for $1.44 billion, a bid that was complicated by a downturn in Qintex's fortunes.

In 37 cases, the target rejected the acquisition outright, and the bidder did not follow through. A key proposal falling under that heading was the $7.1 billion proposal by real estate magnate Donald J. Trump to acquire AMR Corp. Trump rather uncharacteristically backed away when the AMR board balked. And NCNB Corp. dropped a $2.4 billion offer for Citizens & Southern Corp. when that Atlanta-based bank resisted.

Litigation doomed only six deals, but the appearance of legal problems as a cause for deal failures may point to a future trend. Legal issues emerged in several guides. Polaroid Corp. successfully defended a hostile bid of $2.6 billion by Shamrock Holdings Inc. after a victory in the Delaware courts for its defensive ESOP, a decision that in turn fueled a wave of in-house ESOPs throughout Corporate America. Universal Foods Corp., based in Milwaukee, turned aside a $646.7 million bid from High Voltage Engineering Corp., thanks to a federal court decision upholding the Wisconsin antitakeover law. And in a different legal area, the management buyout of U.S. Shoe Corp.'s footwear division was dropped after shareholders charged that the $422.5 million price was inadequate.

In 20 cases, targets dropped initial acquisition agreements when another bidder came in with a higher price. Dana Corp.'s $436 million accord to buy Champion Spark Plug Co. was sidetracked when Champion opted for a $726 million offer from Cooper Industries Inc. □

1989 Profile

The following tables and charts summarize 1989's merger, acquisition, and divestiture activity as recorded in the M&A Data Base, ADP/MLR Publishing and published in the quarterly Rosters of Mergers & Acquisitions. To be included in the M&A Data Base and published in the Rosters, a transaction must involve a U.S. company and must be valued at $1 million or more. Partial acquisitions of 5 percent or more of a company's capital stock are included if the payments are $1 million or more. Divestitures of subsidiary units are also included on this basis. Real property sales and transfers are excluded. When price data of a transaction have not been revealed, the transaction is included if it is believed to meet the price threshold. All data presented here are the most current available in the M&A Data Base at press time. As a result of additional information being received in the M&A Data Base, the figures presented here may be subject to revisions in future issues of Mergers & Acquisitions and may vary slightly from statistics reported in prior issues.

■ VOL. 24 NO. 1 JULY/AUGUST 1989

28 ROUNDTABLE
Managing the Environmental Risks in Acquisitions
Eight experts from varying disciplines discuss the environmental issues in mergers and acquisitions.

43 Do Leveraged Buyouts Pose Major Credit Risks?
Stephen R. Waite and Martin S. Fridson
LBO-intensive industries can shoulder high debt.

48 The Dangers for Buyers in Flawed Products
Robert E. Smith, Norman L.Greene, and Carole R. Bernstein
Acquirers may be haunted by liabilities from the past.

54 Why Baxter Moved Quickly to Absorb American Hospital
Dave Ulrich, Frank LaFasto, and Tony Rucci
Baxter International put a premium on market presence.

65 The Plant-Closing Law: New Pressures on Acquirers
B. Donald Shandor
Failure to give timely notice can be costly.

70 How Foreign Buyers Can Get Double Tax Deductions
Raymond S. Haas and John S. Karls
Overseas buyers can deduct interest costs twice.

■ Vol. 24 No. 2 Sept/Oct 1989

30 ROUNDTABLE
Global Positioning Through Cross-Border M&A
Six m&a professionals size up the competitive stakes in doing cross-border acquisitions.

43 The Debt-Free DCF Model: A Fix on Intrinsic Values
Daniel W. Bielinski
A tool for valuation pros can aid the m&a process.

48 Distribution Synergies: Easy to See, Harder to Get
William J. Best and Ron E. Seger
Combining distribution systems is not simple.

55 A Standard Framework for Speeding M&A Analysis
John R. Brown, Ronald J. Rizzuto, and Ann E. Eastland
Harmonizing viewpoints to facilitate dealmaking.

61 The Cultural Pitfalls in Cross-Border Negotiations
Robert M. Bryan and Peter C. Buck
Culture clashes snag deals between U.S. entrepreneurs and foreign buyers.

68 Creating Value in Strategic Acquisitions
Philippe Haspeslagh
Successful acquisitions require a broad business perspective.

■ Vol. 24 No. 3 Nov/Dec 1989

24 Business Diversification: Has It Taken a Bad Rap?
Stephen L. Nesbitt and Randall R. King
The highly diversified firm has performed no better or worse than the "pure play," according to two investment analysts.

32 The National Security Test for Foreign Acquisitions
Daniel L. Spiegel and Andrew G. Berg
An outgrowth of the new process for reviewing foreign acquisitions may be an antitakeover defense based on national security.

39 SPECIAL SECTION
Leveraged Buyouts: The Challenges of Maturity
With each passing year, the leveraged buyout segment of mergers and acquisitions becomes a more established market with its own set of conventions for executing transactions. In the case of LBOs, however, entrenchment breeds innovation so the major players can continue to weather the tough competition for good deals. In this special section, M&A looks at such cutting-edge issues as stock options for managements, new bank-lending techniques, and recycling of the old LBO to a new financial player.

69 Excerpts from the Sixth Annual Conference on Advanced Issues in Mergers and Acquisitions
The m&a market is never at a loss for new issues to cope with. While still crafting their deals to gain an edge in the fierce marketwide competition, strategic buyers are grappling with a potentially costly and painful set of problems that fall under the heading of risk management — environmental issues, product liability, pensions and other benefits, to name some. These were among the issues worked over at the annual gathering of 150 m&a professionals.

■ Vol. 24 No. 4 Jan/Feb 1990

29 ROUNDTABLE
How the M&A Market Is Meeting New Challenges
Seven investment bankers examine the m&a market's forced adjustment to new financial and economic conditions.

41 Did the Time Decision Torpedo the Hostile Bid?
Jonathan J. Lerner
Corporate raiders took no comfort from the Delaware decision in theTime-Warner-Paramount case. Directors gained the right to use long-term strategies as grounds for rejecting unsolicited bids. There was, however, no blanket authority to "just say no."

46 A User-Friendly Technique for Evaluating Targets
Patrick J. Lyons and Anthony Fabiano
Computer-literate acquisition analysts may be overlooking a critical resource by ignoring expert system technology, also known as the knowledge base. There is an easy way of marrying the bases with electronic work sheets to judge a group of candidates. The results are a quick feedback on how well the targets match the buyer's wish list.

51 Unleashing Property Values to Finance M&A Transactions
Scott E. Fredrick
Real estate has evolved from a "hidden asset" into a financing centerpiece in acquisitions. Innovative instruments, such as mortgage-backed securities, convertible mortgages, and partnerships, can raise funds to pay for the deal. There is even a use for real estate in takeover defenses.

58 How Employee Thievery Can Plague an Acquisition
Raymond G. Boyd Sr.
Workers at both merger partners may be less enchanted about the deal than their employers. Employees sometimes have vented their anger by stealing. The challenge is to stop the losses before they erase the benefits of the acquisition.

65 Creative Detective Work in Acquiring Overseas Firms
Camille H. Chwalek
American firms may be blowing overseas acquisition opportunities by accepting a sparsity of credible information at face value. While hard to come by, data on foreign targets may be more available than a surface examination suggests. The trick is to weave shreds of information into a coherent package.

73 SPECIAL SECTION
Key Dimensions of M&A Activity
Rankings of financial advisers by active industries; trends in control premiums; stock price movements of key acquirers; reverse LBOs.

■ Vol. 24 No. 5 Mar/Apr 1990

25 ROUNDTABLE
How Debt Is Financing More Takeovers in Europe
Eight prominent dealmakers operating in Europe track the growth in m&a debt financing overseas.

35 Innovations to Minimize Acquisition Goodwill
Robert H. Herz and Edward J. Abahoonie
Tax strategy is a more forceful driver of deal structures, as purchase prices outrun actual values. Eliminating or minimizing non-depreciable goodwill is a key way to harvest tax, and has led to the increasingly popular deal format in which the buyer gets less than full control of the target. The Dow-Marion combination is a classic example.

42 Knowing the Ropes in Buying Government Contractors
J. Madden and James F. Worrall
Acquiring a firm with federal contracts is no cut-and-dried proposition. The government carefully scrutinizes contract transfers, and the buyer that doesn't follow the rules can lose the work or suffer disbarment on future contracts. In some cases, the rules can be turned against a hostile bidder as an antitakeover device.

47 Did the Treasury Win or Lose in the RJR Buyout?
Gerard A. Cahill and Camille P. Castorina
Two finance professors, who sized up the massive RJR Nabisco LBO from several angles, claim it will generate a net gain in tax revenue by the end of the 1990s. They agree that deduction of the interest on acquisition debt is costly to the Treasury. But taxes from selling shareholders, reinvestments, divestiture proceeds, and other sources should more than offset the drain.

58 Negotiating a Fair Division of Environmental Costs
George Pilko
Intensified federal and state environmental regulations have complicated m&a dealmaking. A great element of uncertainty about future risks and costs threatens to scuttle many transactions. But negotiating tactics and contract provisions have been established to satisfy buyers, sellers, lenders, and other key parties so a deal can be completed with some peace of mind.

65 How the Common Market Will Control Large Mergers
John Osborne
At last, the European Economic Community has a policy for regulating mergers. After 16 years of wrangling, the EEC decided to focus on large deals that impact competition across the Common Market. The policy could affect U.S. dealmaking as well.
